A DRAMATIC SCENE. Eli Shaw Protests Innocence Over the Bodies of His Dead.

Camden, N. J., Oct. 12.—Eli Shaw, the young man who is charged with killing his mother and grandmother just after they had nursed him through a siege of typhoid fever, was on Saturday taken from his cell in his late home, which lay the dead bodies of his alleged victims. The room was crowded with friends of the family who were there to attend the double funeral. It has not been the fate of many to witness a more harrowing or dramatic scene.

EDITOR DANA PASSES AWAY I

Eminent Journalist a Victim of Liver Complaint.

SKETCH OF AN ACTIVE CAREER I

A Journalist Who For Many Years Had Been Foremost in His Profession, and Who Was an Untiring Worker. Socialistic Ideas of His Early Life.

New York, Oct. 12.—Charles A. Dana, editor of the New York Sun, died at his home in Glen Cove, L. I., at 1:20 o'clock yesterday afternoon. Mr. Dana's death had been expected for several hours, and his family and physicians were at his bedside when the end came.

of distress, and everything possible was done to relieve him. He had been weakened by his long illness, and during the summer several times thought to be on the verge of a fatal collapse, but each time he rallied. He did not improve much with the coming cooler weather, and the sinking spells became more frequent.

On Friday Mr. Dana was able to take only the lightest nourishment, and this condition continued. Paul Dana and his sisters, Mrs. Draper, Mrs. Underhill and Mrs. Brannan, were at his home on Saturday morning, and were warned to remain there. They were at the bedside when death came.

The cause of Mr. Dana's death was cirrhosis of the liver. On June 9 he was at his office apparently strong and healthy. The next day he was taken ill, and he never afterward visited New York.

George William Curtis used to say that if there had been no such thing as Journalism in existence Charles Anderson Dana would have created the business of gathering news and selling it and commenting upon it in such a manner as to attract attention. Or all the men who have gained fame and fortune by newspaper work, Mr. Curtis believed that Mr. Dana was the best equipped for such enterprise both by native ability and acquired endowments.

Although Mr. James Gordon Bennett will probably maintain so long as Journalism lasts the fame he won as the founder of a modern American Journalism, and although Horace Greeley will stand pre-eminent as the political journalist, and Henry J. Raymond as the politician journalist, it is probable that the traditions of Journalism as they shall be told in the future will point to Mr. Dana as the greatest of American journalists.

Yet Mr. Dana had no idea in his early life what his career was to be. As a boy in a rocky and desolate New Hampshire town it seemed to those who knew him that he was physically of such structure as made the successful farmer, the clergyman and the school teacher recognized, however, early in his boyhood days that, big boned and stalwart framed as he even then was for a lad, his physical equipment was well matched by his intellectual. He was one of those boys of whom it sometimes is said that learning is not a study or a task, but a delight for them. He had scarcely any need to go to college. His mind was of that peculiar constitution sometimes discovered which suggests that there is no need of mental discipline. The very qualities which a college curriculum are supposed to develop he possessed by native gift. He took to the classics before he was 10 years of age. He was born at Hinsdale, N. H., on Aug. 8, 1819, and when he was 16 years of age he entered Harvard college, immediately giving evidence that he possessed unusual mental gifts.

But he was obliged to give up his college course. Whether it was overuse of his eyes by candle light or neglect, a functional disturbance which threatened to become organic, compelled him to abandon his books just as he was entering the junior year.

Soon after Mr. Dana thought of a mercantile career, and he went to Buffalo, then a thriving village, where, with a relative, he sold goods over the counter. A short experience was sufficient to satisfy him that his calling was not in trade. He became fascinated with the problems of socialism as they were discussed in his early youth, and he gladly joined that famous but wholly impossible socialist community called Brook Farm, which was established in what was then the town of Roxbury, Mass.

Here Mr. Dana, with Nathaniel Hawthorne, William Ellery Channing, George Ripley,
