WASHINGTON, April 6.

There will be no message sent to Congress to-day. This action was decided upon this afternoon, after a conference between President McKinley and his Cabinet, and leading members of the House and Senate.

This action was taken because of advices from General Lee at Havana late this afternoon. The delay is to enable Lee and the Americans to leave Cuba in safety.

From high authority it is said Gen. Lee telegraphed to Washington to the effect that one American Consul was held up in Cuba and it is impossible to get him away now. He has fears of the safety of Americans should the President's message be made public to-day.

The message, it is given out, will be submitted to Congress to-morrow.

The scene at the capitol to-day was unparalleled in the history of Washington. In every part of the city the crowds were unprecedented, all eager to learn the latest news emanating from official sources.

Thousands sought admission to the Senate and House as early as six o'clock this morning. It is estimated that twelve hundred people were in front of the capitol awaiting the opening of the building at that hour.

President McKinley's message is vigorous in tone, and points directly by inference to the necessity for armed intervention. The President's plan is to pacify the Island and maintain peace in order to secure Cuban independence. He is for peace first ; freedom next. The meinbers of Congress practically agree to the plan, yielding to the President as to the recognition of Cuban independence.

Nothwithstanding the diplomatic hopefulness of many, it is evident that Congress will take action very soon after the receipt of the message, probably the following day, unless in the meantime Spain shall yield to the diplomatic demands of the United States and end the war in Cuba and grant independence. There is no conflict of opinion between Congress and the President as to the duty of the Government to accomplish these results ; there is merely a difference of opinion as to whether independence shall be recognized as existing now, or whether it would
