the second attempt ran off to Locust mountain. It was believed that the man was insane, and that he would probably take his life in some secluded spot on the mountain On the night of the same day he returned to town and tried to gain admittance to the house he had left without being observed. The house has an attic without flooring and entrance to it can be gained through a win dow at either end of the house. Arlusky climed up to one of the windows and crawled in, but he went through the ceiling of the room below. The man scrambled out of the house and then entered by the other window, when he again broke through the unprotected ceiling. This time he was caught and held on a charge made by the owner of the property. Arlusky made no statement to his captors and the belief that be is insune is strengthened.
