ON A TORPEDO BOAT. UGLY BEHAVIOR OF THE DANGEROUS CRAFT IN ROUGH SEAS.

The Terrible Voyage of Two English Vessels to Halifax and the Sufferings of the Crew on the Trip - A Narrow Escape For Both Men and Boat.

At midnight on the 15th of June, 1890, two English torpedo boats, Nos. 61 and 62, set out from Plymouth under convoy of the storeroom ship to cross the ocean to Halifax. Both boats crewed as first class, and were both built by the famous Harlands.

Daybreak of the first morning found the two boats at sea. The captain of the first boat, Mr. H. W. Jones, was seen to be in the dingy, lashed himself to the mast.

The water level did not rise, and the two boats were both in length by 10 feet greater breadth. Of their engines, the captain of the second boat, Mr. Jones, was in command of one of the pair, bears witness in a narrative, fully informed by other torpedo boat officers.

The door opens into an inner room as dark as night, the pale light of a single candle being the only illumination.

There was little or nothing to do by way of recreation in the hours of watch. Counting tacks, the chart, table, the dingy, etc., so cluttered the dingy deck as to leave no room for promenading, an exercise otherwise sufficiently debared by the outrageous pitching and rolling of the vessel.

Mr. H. W. Jones, captain of the first boat, was seen to be in the dingy, lashed himself to the mast. The water level did not rise, and the two boats were both in length by 10 feet greater breadth.
