A Suspicious Act.

On Tuesday night, shortly before 12 o'clock, two strange men entered William Cancierius' saloon, on East Centre street, and ordered two drinks. After drinking they sat down by the stove with the proprietor and began to talk of recent robberies. So deeply one of the men said to Cancierius: "How would you like it if a burglar would draw a revolver, put it to your nose, and say 'Hands up!' What would you do?" At the same time the man pulled a revolver from his pocket. The proprietor rushed towards the stranger and his wife came downstairs with hat in hand. On seeing the woman, the stranger made a rush for the door and escaped down Centre street. His pal remained and asked for another drink, but was refused. He then attempted to entice Cancierius to Justice Shoemaker's office, saying he had three men wanted for robbery. It is supposed that several other pals were in waiting in Market alley to attack and rob Cancierius. He refused to go and the stranger left the place.
