

THE SHIPWRECK OF GLOOM

A Lesson in Courage and In the Value of Life.

By HOWARD FIELDING.
[Copyright, 1910, by American Press Association.]

Mr. Bartlett had not visited his office that morning, and it may have been about noon when an elevator disgorged him on the level of his own place of business. Immediately he was aware of the high keyed, boyish voice of James, his handy man, a creature of many duties and of an anxious, devoted fidelity.

"There's a lady waitin' for you," said James. "She's in your room, she is."

"What sort of a lady?" asked Bartlett.
"A young lady," answered James. "She's been there about half an hour, with a suit case. I never saw her before. She's got blue eyes, very blue eyes, she has. And I guess she ain't feelin' well. I took her in a glass of water a couple o' times an' she drunk it. She was thirsty, she was."

Bartlett shook his head. He could not remember any young lady of this kind. And yet the eyes—
"China blue eyes," said he, "like the color that you've seen on a fine cup and saucer?"

"Well, to tell the truth," said James earnestly, "I never seen such a color anywheres before—not on nothin', I didn't."

Bartlett spent some seconds in reflection.

"Go into my office," said he, "and see if there's a letter from Mr. Carver of Philadelphia amongst my mail. If there is I want it."

Such a communication was indeed there, and James brought it out.

It was the querulous letter of a worried and weary man, and it affected Bartlett like the fling of a saw, for his nerves were in no condition to endure the caterwaulings of a business associate. Carver was afraid of a big note of Bartlett's which was maturing in a Boston bank.

"You'll have to pull money out of the game to meet that note," he wrote, "and that will cripple us. Instead of a handsome profit, we'll be likely to make a loss. And he went on to bewail the loss as if it were already made. He declared that he was not fit even to think of the matter. The long siege of illness in his family had broken his nerve. "And, though we're all on our feet again," he added, "I'm thoroughly tired out. We never should have pulled through except for Celia Gilbert, and now the poor girl who broke down and must go home—nervous prostration, and pretty bad, too, I'm afraid. And she'll have to travel all the way to Boston alone unless you can go over with her Friday night. I see by your letter that you'll be going over Friday or Saturday to try to fix up some way to rement, were eloquent to Bartlett. He knew that this girl's life from that moment to moment was held to a determined standard of calmness and untrusting heroism, and when he remembered that she had come to that sad state through the mere exercise of helpful kindness his soul cried against the government of the universe. She was cousin to Carver's wife; she had gone to that household affliction because she was needed there and for no other reason.

Celia sat in his office all the rest of the day. At half past 5, when Bartlett went aboard the sound steamer with all his worries on his back and his pale, silent girl for sole companion, he was conscious of a depression of spirits such as he had never felt before.

They had some dinner by and by, and perhaps the food was good for Bartlett. At any rate, in the course of the meal he was vouchsafed a revelation. He perceived that Celia's presence was not depressing; he had been laboring under a preconceived idea of what her effect upon him ought to be, in view of her condition, and this false notion had completely fooled him. In reality she had not uttered a complaint all day. She had expressed no despondent view, but had gently striven to dispel the gloom between them, all of which had emanated from himself.

"Upon my word," said he, looking across at her, "you are a very cheerful young woman."
"In comparison with whom?"
"Myself."

She nodded her head and smiled at him.
"I am a good deal worried," said he. "This business of mine in Boston sits on me like an incubus—whatever that is."

"I am sorry," said she.
Perhaps he had looked for a little curiosity, and perhaps the china blue eyes read this in his face, for she tactfully asked a leading question, and he told his story. There were few people in the world with whom he would have spoken as frankly.

"The trouble is," said he in conclusion, "that I dare not go directly to the president of the bank. He's a tartar, and this particular kind of renewal is his pet aversion. But if I can have the matter put up to him in just the right light by a friend of mine (and a pet of his) inside the bank the thing will go through. I don't want Boland even to know that I came over to Boston to see anybody in the bank. I wouldn't have him know it for a thousand dollars."

"Mr. Boland is the president?"
"Yes."
"Suppose you should meet him on the street," she suggested.

"I should dodge into the nearest open door," said he. "If he saw me in Boston at this time he'd know what I was there for, and he doesn't like wirepulling inside his bank."

"I don't like wirepulling anywhere," said Celia. "I think you should meet Mr. Boland deliberately."
"Not for gold and precious stones."
"I have a feeling that you will," she insisted, "and I don't like the idea that you're afraid of him."

"I don't like it myself," said he, "but I am."
"Then you'll surely meet him. I never dare to be afraid of anything for fear that it will happen."
"I admit there's something in it," said he.

Celia retired to her stateroom early, and Bartlett went down to the main deck, where in the girl's absence he relaxed into gloom and consoled himself with strong cigars.

A streaky fog lay on the sound. In the thicker places the steamer would slow down as if bewildered, and her whistle would exchange impatient blasts of nautical conversation with other whistles. A human irritation seemed to animate these tones.

Bartlett thought of Celia lying awake and listening to the mournful and alarming chorus. Tenderness came to his heart. He regretted that he had not been kinder to her; that he had not spoken cheerier words at their parting.

"All the human sense and goodness have gone out of me," he growled. "I am the wreck of what I was."

It was past 11 when he went to his stateroom, and he sat for a long time on the edge of his berth, thinking despondently of the morrow. The whistle was now doing its worst, and the answers were more petulant. He distinguished one voice among them that seemed angrier than the others, and it drew constantly nearer. Then for an interval he missed that voice. Silence reigned for perhaps no more than a minute, but it seemed much longer. Bartlett rose to his feet—he knew not why.

In the depths of the vessel he heard a bell strike once. The vibration of the fabric ceased. The engine was at rest. Suddenly, close at hand, the whistle that he had listened for called out with its strong voice. Two quick blasts answered it from his own vessel, and instantly the bell in the depths rang sharply twice.

Bartlett was in part prepared for what came next, but not for the magnitude of it. The crash as the two ships met seemed natural to his ears, but the infernal din that followed shook the soul of him with terrors wholly unexpected.

Bartlett ran out into the saloon and looked across. He saw some tangled wreckage and a cloud of steam through which was visible a blur of light. This came from the other vessel.

Men were pouring up from below, drenched with water and many of them liberally dabbled with blood.

Celia! The name leaped into Bartlett's mind with a shock that made his head swim. He ran to the door of her room and thumped upon a calling to her. She answered him very much in her usual tone.

"I will be ready in a moment," she said and almost immediately appeared. He was amazed that she should be dressed.

"Are many people hurt?" she asked.
"We must try to help." And he crossed to the wreckage.

An officer and some uniformed negroes, with a passenger or two, were disentangling the injured from the wreck of staterooms. Bartlett joined this party and was astonished to see men and women come forth from the mass of splinters with but a few scratches. He worked with zeal for perhaps two minutes, which seemed long, and sufficed for multitudinous service. Then he climbed out of the tangle and looked around for Celia.

The young lady with nervous prostration, whose doctor had sternly ordered her to abstain from all exertion and excitement, was kneeling on the floor of the saloon deftly bandaging the wounds upon a man's head.

Admiration of her courage thrilled in him. He remembered that his own work was not done. A hoarse voice was calling from behind a stateroom door which was jammed so that it could not be opened. Bartlett got his fingers into a crevice and ripped the lock out through the woodwork. The door swung open.

The interior of that room, if it could still be said to have an interior, was an impossible ruin. The rear wall was the gray sea fog, the berths had fallen into the nether wreckage, the floor was shattered so that it looked like the debris of a picket fence, but it held. And on that shivered floor, clothed in pajamas supplemented by a pair of trousers and one shoe, stood Curtis Boland, president of the R. and R. National bank.

Bartlett extended a hand and drew him to a securer footing. Except for a few bruises and scratches he was unharmed.

"Ha, Mr. Bartlett," said he cheerily, "so you're my preserver. Where is Miss Gilbert? Safe, I trust."

Bartlett pointed across the saloon to where Celia still knelt among the wounded.

"God bless her!" said Boland fervently. "I know her well by sight—her father and I are neighbors in Brooklyn—but I have never met the young lady, so I kept aloof when I saw you with her in the dining room this evening. I expected to meet you later in Boston, of course."

The collision of the two vessels seemed a small shock compared to his collision with Curtis Boland. The service he had rendered utterly debarred him from asking favors at the bank.

The floor did not sink under him. The night's calamities were at an end. Water tight compartments kept the vessel afloat, and she proceeded slowly under her own steam to New London, whence the passengers proceeded by train to Boston.

Bartlett, Boland and Miss Gilbert were companions on this journey, and for a large part of a way the lady, utterly exhausted, slept profoundly. And one of the men watched beside her with something akin to a fatherly affection, the other with deeper tenderness. He knew now why the eyes that he had seen ten years before had never faded from his memory.

"Bartlett," said the banker, "I forget whether you are married."
"I am not," answered Bartlett. "A year from today—who knows?"
There was a long pause.

"Bartlett, how are things going with you?"
"Every prospect pleases," responded the young man.

The banker eyed him for some minutes.
"Perfectly convenient for you to meet that note?"

"I can meet it," answered Bartlett, and then he straightened up in his seat. "I can do many things that would have been hard yesterday. I have had a lesson in courage, in self forgetfulness and in the value of life. I am worth a dozen of the Johnny Bartletts that have been walking the floor this last month, and one of the proofs of it is that I'm not afraid to tell you that I have been walking the floor. I am not afraid of anything or anybody."

Another silence.
"Send me over a little money," said the banker, "as little as you please, just enough to make a showing. Send me the same kind of paper for the balance. Will that suit?"

"I should think so! But I don't ask."
"You have asked nothing," said Boland. "The proposition is mine"

of her room and thumped upon a calling to her. She answered him very much in her usual tone.
"I will be ready in a moment," she said and almost immediately appeared. He was amazed that she should be dressed.

"Are many people hurt?" she asked.
"We must try to help." And he crossed to the wreckage.

An officer and some uniformed negroes, with a passenger or two, were disentangling the injured from the wreck of staterooms. Bartlett joined this party and was astonished to see men and women come forth from the mass of splinters with but a few scratches. He worked with zeal for perhaps two minutes, which seemed long, and sufficed for multitudinous service. Then he climbed out of the tangle and looked around for Celia.

The young lady with nervous prostration, whose doctor had sternly ordered her to abstain from all exertion and excitement, was kneeling on the floor of the saloon deftly bandaging the wounds upon a man's head.

Admiration of her courage thrilled in him. He remembered that his own work was not done. A hoarse voice was calling from behind a stateroom door which was jammed so that it could not be opened. Bartlett got his fingers into a crevice and ripped the lock out through the woodwork. The door swung open.

The interior of that room, if it could still be said to have an interior, was an impossible ruin. The rear wall was the gray sea fog, the berths had fallen into the nether wreckage, the floor was shattered so that it looked like the debris of a picket fence, but it held. And on that shivered floor, clothed in pajamas supplemented by a pair of trousers and one shoe, stood Curtis Boland, president of the R. and R. National bank.

Bartlett extended a hand and drew him to a securer footing. Except for a few bruises and scratches he was unharmed.

"Ha, Mr. Bartlett," said he cheerily, "so you're my preserver. Where is Miss Gilbert? Safe, I trust."

Bartlett pointed across the saloon to where Celia still knelt among the wounded.

"God bless her!" said Boland fervently. "I know her well by sight—her father and I are neighbors in Brooklyn—but I have never met the young lady, so I kept aloof when I saw you with her in the dining room this evening. I expected to meet you later in Boston, of course."

The collision of the two vessels seemed a small shock compared to his collision with Curtis Boland. The service he had rendered utterly debarred him from asking favors at the bank.

The floor did not sink under him. The night's calamities were at an end. Water tight compartments kept the vessel afloat, and she proceeded slowly under her own steam to New London, whence the passengers proceeded by train to Boston.

Bartlett, Boland and Miss Gilbert were companions on this journey, and for a large part of a way the lady, utterly exhausted, slept profoundly. And one of the men watched beside her with something akin to a fatherly affection, the other with deeper tenderness. He knew now why the eyes that he had seen ten years before had never faded from his memory.

"Bartlett," said the banker, "I forget whether you are married."
"I am not," answered Bartlett. "A year from today—who knows?"
There was a long pause.

"Bartlett, how are things going with you?"
"Every prospect pleases," responded the young man.

The banker eyed him for some minutes.
"Perfectly convenient for you to meet that note?"

"I can meet it," answered Bartlett, and then he straightened up in his seat. "I can do many things that would have been hard yesterday. I have had a lesson in courage, in self forgetfulness and in the value of life. I am worth a dozen of the Johnny Bartletts that have been walking the floor this last month, and one of the proofs of it is that I'm not afraid to tell you that I have been walking the floor. I am not afraid of anything or anybody."

Another silence.
"Send me over a little money," said the banker, "as little as you please, just enough to make a showing. Send me the same kind of paper for the balance. Will that suit?"

"I should think so! But I don't ask."
"You have asked nothing," said Boland. "The proposition is mine"

HELD UP IN HOME

Woman Faces Burglars, Who Flee Before Bullets.

HUSBAND BITTEN BY ONE.

"I'll Shoot Your Wife if You Shoot Me!" Would Be Robber Tells George Cisciotta, Whose Wife Puts Up Stiff Fight.

New York, Nov. 1.—The neighborhood of Alexander avenue and One Hundred and Forty-fifth street, the Bronx, was in a turmoil of excitement when shots were exchanged in a running fight between citizens and two men who held up Mrs. Mary Cisciotta, at the point of a gun, in her home at 475 East One Hundred and Forty-fifth street.

One of the alleged holdup men was caught after a fierce fight with a policeman. Both were injured in the scrimmage. George Cisciotta, a building contractor, in whose home the men attempted to rob his wife, was also hurt, having been bitten by one of the men when he tackled him in his parlor.

Mrs. Cisciotta was in the front room of her home when the two men entered, one of them pointing a revolver at her and commanding her to be quiet. At about this time Mr. Cisciotta, who is fifty-three years old, entered the house from the rear, having been in the back yard. Without attracting attention he got a gun from his bedroom.

Then the contractor, revolver drawn, stepped into the hallway leading into the front room and told the men to surrender. Neither moved. One of them continued to point his weapon at Mrs. Cisciotta.

"If you shoot me I'll shoot your wife!" was the answer to Cisciotta's demands to give up.

Cisciotta held his gun on the man who held the other revolver pointed at the woman. In this way they stood several minutes. Finally the men nervously began to edge their way toward the door.

Seeing an opening as he heard the contractor one of the men sprang suddenly, dragging him to the floor. As the two men fell, Cisciotta lost his hold on his gun and in the tussle his left hand was bitten savagely.

Leaving Cisciotta on the floor, the two men ran down a stairway leading to the street. The contractor quickly revived and following the pair began firing at them. The fugitives ran toward Alexander avenue, followed by Cisciotta. Shots were exchanged, but no one was hurt, although there were many persons in One Hundred and Forty-fifth street when the shooting began.

AUTO KILLER ON TRIAL.

Millionaire Whose Car Killed Miss Hough Faces Jury.

New York, Nov. 1.—Edward T. Rosenheimer, indicted for murder in the first degree for the killing of Grace Hough with his automobile on the night of Aug. 18 in the Bronx and going on unheeding, is on trial before Justice O'Gorman in the criminal branch of the supreme court.

There was a special panel of a hundred jurors, but the jury was obtained after forty-five of the talesmen had been examined. Several were excused because they owned motor cars. Rosenheimer is being prosecuted by Assistant District Attorney Maynard, and James W. Osborne appears for the defense.

LOSES LEG UNDER TRAIN.

Runaway Youth Meets With Serious Accident at Middletown.

Middletown, N. Y., Nov. 1.—In trying to board a freight train near Downsville on the Ontario and Western railroad, Cornelius Voorhees, aged seventeen, who ran away from his home, 732 Melrose avenue, the Bronx, ten days ago, fell under the wheels. His left foot was crushed.

He was brought to Thrall hospital, this city, where the leg was amputated. Voorhees' companion was Arthur Bossman of 461 Willis avenue, the Bronx. He is twenty and also ran away.

DRANK ACID THROUGH STRAW.

Mrs. George Coley, Despondent Over Husband's Death, Kills Herself.

Middletown, N. Y., Nov. 1.—Drinking carbolic acid through a straw, Mrs. George Coley quickly succumbed to the draught at her home here. The woman, who had suffered from melancholia for some years following the death of her husband, had recently been growing worse.

Her son, Glen H. Coley, gave up a course he was taking at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, in order to care for his mother.

Starting a Family Jar.

"No man ever obtained anything worth having without working hard for it," said Mrs. Bickers to her husband, who was in a discouraged mood.

"Quite true," replied Mr. Bickers reflectively. "I remember that I obtained you without the slightest difficulty."—Liverpool Mercury.

A Philosopher.

Little Willie—Say, pa, what is a philosopher? Pa—A philosopher, my son, is a man who can pretend to have a light heart when he has a light pocketbook.—Exchange.

The Preparation of Parchment.

Parchment is the skin of saoop or other animals prepared in sheets to render them fit for being written upon. The heavier parchment, used for drumheads, is made from the skins of asses, older calves, wolves and goats. All these are similarly prepared. The skin, being freed from the hair, is placed in a lime pit to cleanse it from fat. The pelt is then stretched upon a frame, care being taken that the surface is free from wrinkles. The flesh is pared off with a circular knife, after which it is moistened, and whitening spread over it. Then the workman, with a large pumice stone, rubs the skin. He next goes over it with an iron instrument and rubs it carefully with pumice stone without chalk. Finally the skin is gradually dried, tightening being occasionally required.

Sounds Like it.

Could it be that the prophet Isaiah had in his forecast the hurried traveler at the railroad eating station of our day when he wrote, "And he shall snatch on the right hand and be hungry, and he shall eat on the left hand and shall not be satisfied?"—Brownings Magazine.

Garters as Ornaments in China.

In answer to an inquiry, Consul General Amos P. Wilder, of Shanghai, reports that there is no demand for suspenders and garters in China, save among foreigners. Suspenders do not interest the native, his trousers being so constructed as to render the use of such article unnecessary neither is there any need for garters, as the trousers when properly adjusted are tied over the sock at the ankle with a neat band of ribbon or cotton. Occasionally a native is seen with a well known make of American garters, which are worn outside the trousers as ornaments.—Consular Report.

Coldest Place in the World.

The lowest temperature yet registered is nowhere near the North Pole. In fact, it is almost exactly on the equator, but far up in the air. On August 30, 1908, this temperature, 119.7 below zero Fahrenheit, was shown by a thermometer sent up in a "sounding balloon" to a height of twelve miles at Shirati, on Victoria Nyanza. It is not to be supposed that if the balloon had gone up a little higher, a still lower temperature would have been discovered. There is now known to be a sharply defined limit.—Literary Digest.

ESTABLISHED 1836
THE OLDEST BANK IN WAYNE COUNTY
—THE—HONESDALE NATIONAL BANK

CAPITAL,	$ 150,000.00
SURPLUS	241,711.00
TOTAL ASSETS	1,902,000.00

WE ARE AFTER YOU!

You have more or less banking business. Possibly it is with us, such being the case you know something of our service, but if not a patron would it not be well for you to become one?

OUR SAVINGS DEPARTMENT will help you start. It is calculated to serve all classes, the old and the young, the rich and the poor,
MEN, WOMEN AND CHILDREN
IT RECEIVES DEPOSITS OF $1.00 AND UP and allows three per cent. interest annually. Interest will be paid from the first of any month on all deposits made on or before the 10th of the month provided such deposits remain three calendar months or longer.

HENRY Z. RUSSELL, PRESIDENT.
ANDREW THOMPSON, VICE PRESIDENT.

EDWIN F. TORREY, CASHIER.
ALBERT C. LINDSAY, ASSISTANT CASHIER.

CASTORIA

The Kind You Have Always Bought, and which has been in use for over 30 years, has borne the signature of Chas. H. Fletcher and has been made under his personal supervision since its infancy. Allow no one to deceive you in this. All Counterfeits, Imitations and "Just-as-good" are but Experiments that trifle with and endanger the health of Infants and Children—Experience against Experiment.

What is CASTORIA

Castoria is a harmless substitute for Castor Oil, Paregoric, Drops and Soothing Syrups. It is Pleasant. It contains neither Opium, Morphine nor other Narcotic substance. Its age is its guarantee. It destroys Worms and allays Feverishness. It cures Diarrhoea and Wind Colic. It relieves Teething Troubles, cures Constipation and Flatulency. It assimilates the Food, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, giving healthy and natural sleep. The Children's Panacea—The Mother's Friend.

GENUINE CASTORIA ALWAYS Bears the Signature of
Chas. H. Fletcher
The Kind You Have Always Bought
In Use For Over 30 Years.
THE CENTAUR COMPANY, 77 MURRAY STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

KRAFT & CONGER INSURANCE

HONESDALE, PA.

Represent Reliable Companies ONLY

SHE SMILED AT HIM.

WILL JONES

new that note. But you won't be able to do it. You'll have to pay up—confound the luck!

"I'm sending Celia to you. She remembers you ten years ago, when you were one of Johnny Harvard's lambs, though she was only a child at the time. You used to call on her sister or cousin or somebody. And, by the way, if you can go over with her, go by boat. Celia has had the most confounded luck in traveling by train. She's been in three accidents—no fancy smashups, but just the usual thing—an engineer and a couple of mail clerks sent aloft; nobody hurt in the high priced seats. The last case was a carload of laborers that got in the way, and Celia saw some of them afterward. I think she'd get a better night's rest on the boat."

Bartlett took off his hat and passed his left hand downward from the top to the back of his head. His brain was sore to the touch.

"This is my finish," he said. "The girl will drive me crazy, but I can't in common decency let her go over alone. I have broken bread in her father's house, and the old chap was kind to me."

An ordinary man might have seen in Celia Gilbert only a very pretty girl who was pale and looked as if she had been ill. Bartlett saw far more. The slightly gathered brows, the steepled lips, the voice constantly controlled to guard against the revelation of a causeless excite-