Her's was not a life of pleasure at all times as manifested by her severe suffering and the patience with which she bore it was a manifestation of her trust and confidence in God who doeth all things well. When Mrs. Hinkkle arrived in town, early in the winter, she was not in real good health and tipped the scale at or near the 150-pound mark and coming as she does from a town so noted as a health resort, her friends and relatives were quite anxious to note the effect a change of surroundings and climate would have. Mrs. Hinkkle is loud in her praise of her home town, but old and ancient "Hopedale" will not take a back seat in the show, as a healthy place and a great flesh producer and is as much up-to-date in other lines, as many of the railroad towns. Two daily mails supply the town with all the required news of the world at large and the local and long distance telephone lines are dispensors of all the doings, far and near, also a handy stenographic visiting affair without going out in the weather.
