ALL ABOUT HENS

If there's any grass clip it into little bits of pieces with a scissors. Don't mix charcoal and grit with your food. The chickens know how much they want. Put food in one corner, and water in the other corner. They'll get so much more exercise.

One of the most dangerous things is the spilling of water into alfalfa, and letting it get dry and mouldy. If they get brooder pneumonia all your chicks will die.

Good Remedy For White Plague. Rice boiled in sweet milk is a good remedy for the white plague. Put it on the stove, and let it simmer slowly. When it is thoroughly cooked dry its good for the chickens.

Change of diet is often a good thing. Medicine is of no avail. I am as sure that medicine is of no avail as that I am that I live or that Johnny cake is good. As long as you don't give them sloppy food you're alright.

Lots of little chicks die from head lice. Dip your little finger in olive oil and rub it over the top of the head of every little chick. If there's any there, it'll kill them. Treat the throat the same way.

Setting Hens Right. Persian insect powder is good. When you make a nest for a setting hen, make the box big enough. Have it at least 16 or 18 inches each way. Cover the bottom with earth, and put slaked lime over it. Take hay and pack it down to make a good solid nest. Don't make it too deep. Just make it so deep that the eggs will stay in.

Red mites come up at night and pester the life out of a setting hen. Air-slacked lime is a pretty good preventive.

First of all paint your nest-box inside and out with one of the coal tar products, as carbolic acid, cresote, carbolic stain, etc., and you won't be worried by mites.

If you keep your coops cleanly, the floors dry, and lice and mites out the boxes, you are not liable to get diseases among your hens.

Cure For Roup. Roup is caused by bad ventilation. People think this is a winter disease, but it often occurs in Summer. Give the hens all the fresh air you can give them, from the front of the building.

Stocker Asks Questions. Following the lecture an opportunity was given to ask questions. Rhamanthus Mortimer Stocker, editor of the Wayne County Herald, asked several. One of them was: "How old do you keep hens?"

In reply Prof. McGrew told of having selected 500 hens four years ago on his place. Last winter was their third winter. This is their fourth winter. They laid more than enough eggs to pay for their keep. Leg-horns, he said, are profitable for three winters.

Prof. McGrew also spoke of the importance of having deep straw in the coops. "Don't let them have a single grain," he said, "unless they scratch for it. What you want is depth. We got 69 cents part of the winter for some of our eggs."

Old Theory Exploded. When the question "In selecting eggs for hatching how can you tell the hens from the roosters?" was put to Prof. McGrew, he was admittedly stumped, and said: "I can't tell No one can tell. If we could, we'd all be raising pullets!"

Going into the poultry business, Prof. McGrew, advocated as a splendid way for people to make a living. "It means hard work," he said, "but not near as hard work as working in a factory or a store." "There's lots of money in fresh eggs!"

A rising vote of thanks was given Prof. McGrew for his splendid lecture, and an opportunity afforded those present to join the Poultry Association at a reduced rate, of which many availed themselves.
