The story of "The Fortune Hunter" is direct and simple, and is drawn from life with character types familiar to the average American. In his making of the play Winchell Smith has told the story with humor, with here and there a touch of pathos. The piece tells of the regeneration of a young man of to-day through his own efforts, and the finding of his true self comes only with the working out of a base scheme which would lead to getting his fortune through marriage with an heiress. The play begins with the appearance of Nat Duncan, who has been a complete failure in everything he has attempted. In the apartments of his chum Harry Kellogg, who has been the great opposite—successful to the highest degree. Nat is desperate, refuses to accept more favors from Kellogg, and is ready for suicide or to get relief from his struggles for money. When he finds Nat in this frame of mind, Kellogg unfolds a scheme and "the down-and-out Nat" agrees to work it out. According to the rubes, he is bound in honor to live for a year in a small county town, selected by Kellogg, forswear all former habits and lead an exemplary life in the village. The element of love that comes into his life is a relief for the sordidness of the original scheme which he renounces, and in this the author has effected an ending that is logical and pleasing.
