

'AND YOU'LL REMEMBER ME.'

One evening as the sun went down
Among the golden hills,
And silent shadows, soft and brown,
Crept over vines and rills,
I waited for the dusky tent a-wing
Dip down the dusky sea;
Harkening, heard a maiden sing,
"And you'll remember me."
"When other lips and other hearts,"
Came drifting through the trees;
"In language whose excess imparts,"
Was borne upon the breeze,
Ah! love is sweet and hope is strong,
And life is a summer song.
A woman's soul is in her song—
"And you'll remember me."
Still slipping from the throbbing throat,
With joy akin to pain,
There seemed a tear in every note
A sob in every strain;
Soft as the twilight shadows creep
Across the listless sea,
The singer sang her love to sleep
With "You'll remember me."
—Cy Warman, in New York Sun.

A Search For a Romance.

MARK PARLINGTON was in distress. That was one reason why he took a handsome straight from the doctor's to Ralph Gray's rooms in the Albany. He knew or might have known, that it was just the time when Ralph was most busy—the prime of the morning, when the writer's ideas are most vigorous and, as he fondly hopes, most original. But Mark was not altruistic enough to care two pins whether he disturbed his friend in the middle of a notion or a fried sole. And yet he, too, was a writer.

"He bounded into Ralph's rooms like a tipcat.
"I'm under sentence, my dear fellow," he cried, heedless of the composed look of reproach that was leveled at him, "and I thought you'd like to know."

"That's tiresome," exclaimed Ralph, methodically closing his fountain pen.
"Now, what I want to know is," proceeded Mark Parlington, "where am I to go? Egad, if only I could meet with a girl like the future Mrs. Gray—at least, if all you say of her is to be believed."

"A most wise reservation, that!" said Ralph. "But there, now, why not get off to Wales and try your own luck? People don't value Wales as they ought. It is a lovely country, and you will find the people in the out-of-the-way parts extraordinarily simple and unspoiled."

"All right. Give me her address, or at least tell me her name; and if she comes up to your own portrait of her, by Jove, Ralph, I'll take the leap, too, and settle down."

"I'll not give you her address, my dear fellow, nor tell you her name. But I'll tell you where I met her, and I think you'll have no difficulty in finding others something like her. You can take a train to Pwllheli and then make your way to Abernallyn anyhow you please."

Parlington picked up his stick. "Thanks, my dear fellow. Oh, by the way, just write it down, will you? Aber—something or other is vague. I hope the grub will be endurable?"

"Yes, it will be endurable," said Ralph, and he wrote the name on a slip of paper. "There you are, and a good time to you."

Mark Parlington was much more impulsive than he looked. He was forty-one, stout, rather more red of face than he liked to be, and with ears that stuck out from his head as if they were the split halves of a hoop with the rounded parts set to his skull.

The day after his interview with Ralph Gray he took train for Wales. It was close upon 4 o'clock when he reached Abernallyn. An air of sacred calm was over the village. The very pigeons of the place were penned. Words cannot say more to prove the profundity of Abernallyn's Sunday torpor.

At this stage of his adventures Mark heard steps behind him, and the door of a cottage opened. He turned to look into a pair of sunny gray eyes. They belonged to a young woman, whose pretty figure was well declared by her tight-fitting black dress. There was either the beginning or the end of a smile upon her lips. The lips were small and shapely, and so were the teeth they half hid. Mark did not take in all at once the fact that this girl was beautiful, but he felt instinctively that she had a human heart under her bodice. In reply, therefore, to her charmingly liped "Can we offer you shelter, sir?" he poured out his plaint. There was an elderly, dark-eyed and hard-faced woman in the gloom of a passage behind, and the night-cap on her head at once made Mark regard her as an enemy. But as he sat on a chair in the little room, cumbered with millinery, into which he had been invited, and watched the play of the girl's face, Mark knew that he had gained an ally.

He sat in patience while the girl opened and carried on a lengthy conversation with the night-capped lady.

"My aunt says, sir," observed the girl at length, "that if you will excuse the confusion she shall give you a room."

Another look into the gray eyes and all Mark's scruples fled.

"I cannot tell you how relieved I feel," he said, with a genuinely grateful ring in his voice, as he followed the girl into a chamber about nine feet square, the prim horse haired furniture of which was disguised under its coat of dust.

"That is my father," said the girl, pointing to the portrait of a broad-shouldered man in black with a kindly expression on his somewhat shaggy face, and with a roll of paper in his hand, as if it were a truncheon. "And that," indicating a minister on the other side of the room, "is my father's brother, Uncle Owen."
"What must I call you?" asked Mark, when his pretty deliverer brought him his tea and sat down to see him eat it.

"My name? Oh, it is Claude Rowlands—I am generally called Claudia; I like it best—and Mrs. Griffiths is my aunt. You see it is the hiring time, and she is so busy then that one of us, my sister or me, comes to help her with the shop—it is amusing, too!"

"Very, I should think, Claudia. An uncommon name, Claudia, and not so ill-sounding either! Oh, good gracious, what's up?"
The girl laughed as Mark righted himself. His chair had broken through the floor.
"It is too shocking, this house, to ask you into. Indeed, I am sorry for you Mr. —"

"Parlington, Claudia—Mark Parlington. And you mustn't say such things. I am well content."

They went to chapel together in the evening—Mr. Parlington, Mrs. Griffiths and Claudia. It was Mark's suggestion, and it seemed to raise him in the postmistress's regard. After the service, however, he had compensation. The rain had set in again. Mrs. Griffiths locked the house-door. The three sat together until ten o'clock. The postmistress did not understand English. Mark thanked heaven for it. But she kept her eyes on him, and even when, at Claudia's request, she sanctioned the cigar for which her guest was pining, she watched the smoke of it with an expression that was not exactly comforting.

"You must not mind aunt," whispered Claudia at that moment, when the elder lady had left the room and the girl was kneeling to use the bellows to the reluctant fire. Her pretty head touched Mark's arm while she worked—it was such a very small room. "She is stricter than you younger ones. And, besides, I was two years with an English school, because my father he was resolved his children should know the English and the Welsh—but I speak it badly yet."

"I don't know when I've heard English spoken so sweetly," said Mark; and he meant it.

His second day in Abernallyn did but confirm his earlier impressions about this Welsh girl. He saw her now in her role of busy worker, doing everything that came in her way, and doing it all with the most winsome cheerfulness.

The shop was full of customers almost from daybreak. It was odd where they came from, and also how they got their money. But, as the girl said, they mostly had six months' wages in their pockets and they meant to spend them quickly. Every one wanted Claudia. It annoyed Mark very much to see how she was at the disposal of little girls of thirteen or fourteen who wished for ostrich feathers and sulphur-colored bonnets a foot high, and sat down to make sure she did not forget their desires. And it annoyed him most of all to perceive the cordial footing she was upon with all the handsome young seafaring men who dallied so long in the shop on the pretext of letters, pipes or snuff.

He dined on tin salmon of an indifferent brand; but Claudia served it, and at his request shared it with him. She was not a bit troubled at being asked to dine with him, but there was just a suspicion of deference in her manner, which made her all the more charming.

Then she again took up her bonnets and continued to run between the shop and Mr. Parlington's room till even Mark's obdurate nature yearned in pity for her.

"Will you not come out with me?" he asked. She excused herself with a smile. The bonnets and her aunt were her plea; but Mark saw it in her face that a sense of propriety also deterred her. Yet this same sense of propriety did not prevent her sitting with him for hour after hour in the evening, while she worked by the light of one candle, and Mark smoked cigar after cigar, and studied her face.

Mrs. Griffiths came periodically to peep at them. She did not seem pleased by her niece's conduct, but as there was no relaxation in the bonnet making she uttered no audible protest.

Somehow the talk took a literary turn. Claudia's father, who was a tradesman in a town at some distance, was also a preacher. The roll of paper in his hands on the wall was one of his sermons. Claudia climbed the stairs to fetch a manuscript copy of the sermon the old gentleman had preached in Abernallyn only the last Sunday. Mark read a little of it, praised its vigor (which was undeniable), set it aside, and again turned his attention to the girl's gray eyes, which had almost a morbid sparkle of beauty in them by the candle light.

"I suppose, Claudia, you don't read many novels?" he asked.

"No, Mr. Parlington, and it is strange yet that I should not—though I cannot tell you altogether why. But when I was a very little girl my Uncle Owen there took me upon his knees and said I was never to read those books, and I said I would not. They are wicked things, novels, Mr. Parlington, and put idle and vain thoughts into girl's minds."

"I myself am a writer of novels, Claudia," said Mark, stooping to see what effect his words would have upon the girl's face.

But they seemed to have hardly any. She colored slightly, and her eyes took an earnest expression.

"Indeed, I am sorry I said that," she whispered. "They may not be so bad as Uncle Owen thinks, and I suppose some people must write them, as there are people who read them."

"She puts me down as a sort of scavenger," thought Mark, with much mental disaffection.

"Claudia! Claudia!" called the aunt, and, laying aside her work, the girl excused herself, and left the room. When an hour had passed and she had not returned Mark went to bed. He shuddered to think what Abernallyn would be for him if she were not in it.

The next morning she said to him: "I have a letter from my father this day, and I am to return to him the day after to-morrow. They miss me so much at home."

"The day after to-morrow!" echoed Mark. It was as if a veil had suddenly been drawn between him and the sunlight.

"Yes, I shall be sorry, and I shall be glad, too. I am happy at home and I am happy here; but I do not sleep so well at Abernallyn, though I do not tell auntie."

Mark put his hand to the girl's brow. It was much too warm. He fancied the pretty forehead clung to his palm, and the fancy made his heart beat.

"You are the goddess of self-sacrifice, Claudia," he exclaimed, "and your aunt is a—"

But the girl's little white hand was to his lips in a moment. "You must not say anything against my aunt. I love her very much. She is lonely and does not think people tire themselves."

Mark kissed the fingers that had thus assumed to bar his speech and gallantly returned the hand to its owner.

"You should not have done that, Mr. Parlington," she murmured. "It is not a very clean hand just now. I am afraid; indeed, it is not."

"It is a good one, and that is enough for me," said Mark. Her blush after the kiss had cheered him like an elixir in his veins.

The next day was misty and cold, and the southwest wind drove the sea hard into Abernallyn's little bay.

"Our last day," said Mark, when Claudia greeted him with her usual gladsome "good morning." Her eyes were very dark underneath.

"Yes, and it will be a bad one, too, Mr. Parlington. I am so sorry for you. But why will you leave Abernallyn as well as me?"

"Do you think I could tolerate it without you?" retorted Mark.

Claudia laughed with a certain constraint.

"You would soon forget me," she said, "and will you please to like your eggs with the bacon or done simply in the pot?"

"Anyhow, Claudia, so your pretty hands bring them to me."

It was really a melancholy day outside. The weather, of course, too, affected the attendance in the shop. But Mark was concerned to hear the deep voices of mankind nearly always when Claudia left him, and her clear laughter never failed to encourage them in their guffaws.

Still, there were bonnets enough ordered to keep Claudia's lissome fingers in motion whenever she was not required in the shop; and she did most of this work in the little room with the broken floor and the photographs on the wall. Mark sat at one side of the table watching her. It seemed to him he had been doing this off and on for years. He knew each of her fingers by heart, and where her hair was thickest over that sensible little forehead of hers.

"Are you, Mr. Parlington, always so idle? No, no, I do not mean that, please forgive me. But when you are not here do you not work like other people?" asked Claudia at one time.

"Yes, I work, my Claudia, and pretty hard, too."
"But you mean at the writing, do you not? Is that real work, Mr. Parlington?"

"Faith, I think so, child."
The girl dropped her needle and a hazy expression of far-awayness stole into her gray eyes. "I do not know if I shall ever be very wise, but I do feel so curious about London at times. It is chiefly when I lie awake in the night."

"Coughing?"
"Well, yes, perhaps I am coughing—though you must not think me weak and good for nothing. My Uncle Owen says I have silly little ears, but that I should be more foolish if they were larger."

"I don't quite know, Claudia, what your Uncle Owen meant by that, but I think your ears, like every other part of you, are perfect."

The girl's cheeks crimsoned and she looked up. "Ah," she said, "but that is only a compliment! My sister Grace—she is older than me—has had many things like that said to her."

"Your sister Grace, Claudia, what is she like?"
"If you will excuse me, I shall show you."

The girl tripped upstairs, but soon returned with two photographs.

"That is Grace—is she not sweet? and yet there are many who say we are much alike. And this is the gentleman she is to marry."

Once again by his convulsive start Mark sent his chair leg through the floor.

as she gazed earnestly at him, "you do not mean that!"
"I swear by—by your Uncle Owen and your father there, and by your own sweet self, that I mean every word of it."

"Oh, dear, oh, dear—only think of it! Coming, auntie!"

This last was in answer to a querulous cry for her from the other side of the door, which Mark had shrewdly blocked.

Five minutes passed ere Claudia returned. She appeared in a pretty straw hat.

"See, Mr. Parlington," she said, pointing to the patch of blue in the sky that was visible from the window, "it is better weather. Aunt says I may take you as far as the old church to show you my grandfather's tomb."

"Oh, with pleasure," observed Mark.

It was the most imposing monument in the churchyard, a little marble column telling of the deceased's many virtues (in Welsh) and indicating his age at death as eighty-two.

"You have not given me my answer, Claudia," said Mark, leaning against the railings.

"I will tell you why I asked you to come here, Mr. Parlington. My grandfather was very fond of me, and when he was in his last illness he said I was to do nothing serious in my life without praying over him. I have just prayed. He tells me to say to you that if you mean what you said you shall please to come here again the next May hiring time and I will then say 'Yes' or 'No.' I am sorry if I do not make you happy."

"Oh, but you do, my sweetheart," retorted Mark, eagerly. "A year is nothing. It will soon pass, and then—you will be mine, my darling, forever."

"Well," said Ralph Gray, when Mark Parlington had told him the story of his adventure at Abernallyn. Just a week had sped since his abrupt Irish after sentence by Dr. Gibney.

"You ought to consider yourself a lucky fellow."

He said it with a shadow of dissatisfaction on his face, as if he were not wholly pleased with the turn of events.

"I do, Ralph—upon my honor I do."
"Then I take it for granted that you will keep to your word and claim Claudia this time next year."

"Why, certainly, I said so. Dear, dear, how gone I was upon her, to be sure."

"Was!"
"Don't be so confoundedly sharp on a fellow's nerves. I meant 'am,' of course. And now, t-a-t! I'll be off to the club."

Ralph smiled rather bitterly. As for Mark, no sooner was he in the street than he clapped his hands to his side.

"By jove!" he exclaimed. "Only think, if she is in the habit of making an annual tryst with her lovers at her granddad's grave! What a novel situation—there's the grit in it. The dear, cajoling little chit, with her melodious sibilations! I'm glad I have her photograph; it would be a pity not to keep her memory green in me for awhile."—London Black and White.

When an Elephant is Crazy.

When we present the elephant in possession of such intellectual gifts as may be his, there has to be considered the case of the elephant that, being "must," is for a time bereft of its senses. It is only the male that suffers from this affliction of insanity; but every male is liable to it some time or other, and, unfortunately, may be attacked by it without warning of any kind.

Some men of long experience of elephant keeping say that the "must" condition is preceded by premonitory symptoms, and if taken in time may, by diet and treatment, be averted, but, without presuming to contradict those better-informed people, I can aver that I have known some of them to be taken by surprise by the sudden "musting" of elephants under their own immediate supervision.

Some elephants become demons of cruelty when "must," as, for example, a commissariat elephant that, during my time in Oudh, broke away from the Lucknow lines and went over a considerable tract of country, killing men, women and children wherever it found an opportunity of doing so.

I do not remember the total number killed by that beast, but it was sadly large. And, of course, valuable as the animal was to the Government, only one course could be pursued in regard to it. The sentence passed upon it was that of death, and the execution was carried out, not without difficulty and danger to the executioners, by several Europeans, who followed and shot it down.—Blackwood's Magazine.

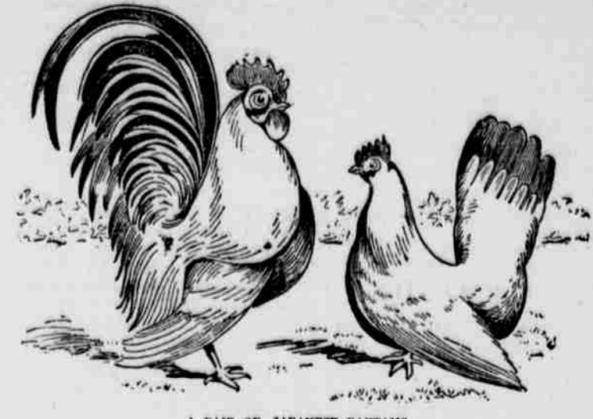

The Navy War College.

The Naval War College is a sort of naval university, where graduates of the Naval Academy are sent to study the higher branches of naval education. The college was started by Admiral Luce some ten years ago. Its idea is to take the officers when they are not on sea duty and give them instruction in the management of fleets, the history of naval warfare and the "grand strategy" as opposed to ordinary tactics. The college occupies a fine building at Newport, Rhode Island, and after an interruption of some time will be in active operation during the summer. The commanding officer of the cruiser New York was President of the college, and in preparation for his work wrote the now famous books on "Sea Power in History," and "Sea Power in the French Revolution and Empire," two works accepted as authoritative by all European countries.—Trenton (N. J.) American.

Poultry in Miniature.

These tiny specimens of poultry are, on account their size, very popular as pets for children; but they are also a profitable fowl, and repay all trouble and expense. They require little room, are quite hardy and contented in confinement, and are small eaters and excellent layers. Of course, from their size much cannot be expected from them in the way of flesh, but what meat they do furnish is very delicate and fine flavored. Their eggs are considered to be particularly good for invalids.

The principal varieties of bantams are the game, rose-combed black, rosecombed white, golden and silver Sebright, booted white, Nankin, Pekin and Japanese.

A PAIR OF JAPANESE BANTAMS.

Game bantams were produced by crossing the English fowl with the bantam, and by breeding in-and-in until the desired size was obtained. There are now about as many varieties of game bantams as there are of the game breed.

The rose-combed black and white bantams are two of the most beautiful and best laying varieties. The birds when young are rather delicate, owing to rapid feathering. The black variety is the black Hamburg fowl in miniature.

ture. Their eggs are large in proportion to the size of the bird.

The golden and silver Sebrights are two varieties originated at the beginning of this century by Sir John Sebright by crossing different breeds, the first cross being between a common bantam and a Polish fowl. The tail is entirely unlike that of bantams in general, being square and expanded, and the feathers broadening towards the ends.

The booted white is the oldest known bantam breed. They are very tame and hardy, with pure white plumage, which is very liable to get sunburned unless given a sheltered run.

Semi-Amphibious Hawaiians.

The natives of the Sandwich Islands take first rank as swimmers. They are almost amphibious, living quite as much in the water as on the land, and are adepts at swimming and playing in the water almost from babyhood.

Lady Brassey has described their wonderful swimming powers. She says: "All the kings and chiefs have been special adepts in the invigorating practice of surf-swimming, and all the present king's sisters are considered first-rate hands at it. The performers begin by swimming out into the bay and diving under the huge Pacific rollers, pushing their surfboards—flat pieces of wood about four feet long by two feet wide, pointed at each end—edgewise before them. For the return journey they select a large wave, and then, either sitting, kneeling or standing on their boards, rush in shoreward with the speed of a race horse on the curling crest, enveloped in foam and spray, and holding on, as it were, by the milk-white manes of their furious coursers."

This is a most enjoyable amusement, but only those who have tried it know that its performance is only possible to expert and fearless swimmers. The majority of children in the Sandwich Islands are expert swimmers before they are able to walk.—New York Dispatch.

Ginghams in Favor.

Ginghams are to be worn more than ever. Crinkled effects, like crepon, in shades of green, violet and yellow, sell from thirty-five cents to fifty cents a yard. The dotted ginghams are novelties. They are sixty-cents a Ginghams in Favor.

Ginghams are to be worn more than ever. Crinkled effects, like crepon, in shades of green, violet and yellow, sell from thirty-five cents to fifty cents a yard. The dotted ginghams are novelties. They are sixty-cents a yard. An ecru gingham will be sprinkled with brown, dark blue or green dots, and made up with cream-tinted lace and moire ribbons to match the dot. A gingham almost dressy enough to be worn at a garden party is woven with bands of wide lace insertion. It comes in all the new delicate shades, and sells for fifty cents a yard. The plaid gingham is out of style, and revers have quite outgrown their popularity.—New York World.

GINGHAM AND EMBROIDERY.

Original Ossified Man.

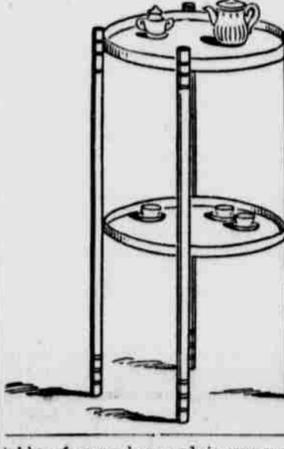

In the Museum of Natural History at Dublin is the skeleton of a man, a native of the south of Ireland, who was called the ossified man. His body became ossified during his lifetime. He lived in that condition for years. Previous to the change he had been a healthy young fellow of superior strength and agility. One night he slept out in a field after a debauch and some time later he felt the first symptoms of the strange transformation. The doctors could do nothing to avert the progress of his malady. His joints stiffened. When he wanted to lie down or rise he required assistance. He could not bend his body, and when placed upright he resembled a statue of stone. He could stand, but not move in the least. His teeth were joined and became an entire bone. The doctors, in order to administer nourishment, had to make a hole through them. He lost the use of his tongue and his sight left him before he died.—Chicago Herald.

Cæsar Killed by a Bowie Knife.

A wealthy Texan rancher recently rejected an expensive ring which he had ordered, because it did not come up to his idea of proper treatment. The subject was the assassination of Julius Cæsar. The Texan objected to the dagger. He wanted a bowie knife, and a bowie knife it had to be before he would pay a nickel.—New York Mail and Express.

A Home-Made Tea-Table.

Now that the fashion of offering tea to afternoon callers is so general, tea-tables of every shape and size are seen. Those that have a double stand are found to be more convenient, and such a one can be easily made from two barrel covers turned so that the rim will stand up, and secured by four broom stick legs, which are screwed into the covers, says the Household.

If this table is painted with the ivory white enamel paint that is now so popular for furniture, the rims of the covers lined with gilt paint, and a few lines of the gilt striping the legs at the top and bottom, it will be very handsome and serviceable.

Hard Study Agrees With Her.

Anxious that his ten-year-old daughter should excel her school-mates, Edmund Mays, of Boston, forced the child to study French, German and algebra up to 11 o'clock in the evening for three months. Contrary to general expectation, the unusual strain does not appear to have injured her in the least, and her progress in the studies has been remarkable.—New York Mail and Express.