A Boston paper thinks it is hard to believe that a man is telling the truth when you know you would lie were you in his place.

As a girl is bound to do what she honestly feels she can do best, she should never question how her work may seem to another, provided it does not absolutely injure another. In many cases much more good might be done by girls and women, if, instead of talking so much about the privileges they lack, they should confidently take the places they ought to fill.

In a circular sent out by State Superintendent Schaeffer concerning Arbor Day, Oct. 15th, he says that in a response to the first Arbor Day proclamation in 1885 there were 50,000 trees planted by teachers and pupils of the public schools of Pennsylvania, and the annual recurrence of the event had led to the planting of thousands of additional trees and to the better adornment of the grounds around the school and around the home.

If we have success in an undertaking, we deserve credit for it; if we fail, the blame rests outside of ourselves—that is the way we incline to look at our course in life. Yet, as a matter of fact, our successes are largely due to others, and our failures to ourselves. It is because others have given us prompting, or counsel, or warning, or inspiration, or material aid, that we have done as well as we have, at every favorable turn in our career. It is because we have not availed ourselves as we might of the proffered help of others, or have neglected to use aright our opportunities and powers, that in so many cases we have failed of accomplishing that to which we had set ourselves. But it is so much easier to see the good side of our own course, and the defects or lack in the course of others, than it is to see our own faults and the superiority of our fellows, that our constant tendency is to shift blame from ourselves to others, and to make a similar misapplication of praise.

Too many of us are looking forward to happiness in the future years, instead of getting all the enjoyment possible out of the present. It is well to remember that the time never will come, in this world, when we shall have everything we want, just where and when we want it. The only way to be happy is to enjoy all we have to the utmost as we go along. It is right to lay up for old age in youth; right to prepare for a rainy day, but it is not right to bend all our energies to this end, and put off until the future the happiness we might enjoy every day. It is far to common to see people working and saving, denying themselves all recreation and many comforts, to lay up money to buy more land, to build a larger and finer house, or to save for their children, thinking that when they have accomplished this they will be happy, and begin to take comfort. The hoped for point may never be attained; or, if it is, sickness or death may have come first, and the dear ones whom we expected to be happy with may be gone forever.

Perhaps there is no quality of the human character which is at once so familiarly spoken about and so little understood, as good-nature. Nothing in the world is easier than to establish a claim to the possession of this excellent gift; nothing is more difficult than to disprove pretensions thus grounded on appearances, and, by showing what professions to be good-nature is merely vanity or laziness. But where good-nature really and truly exists—and there are many such instances of the genuine quality, despite a host of unworthy imitations—we can scarcely value it too highly. For true good-nature is one of the best and pleasantest gifts a man can have, a blessing alike to himself and to his friends—yes, to all around him, no matter in what relative positions they may stand to him, or he to them. For the really good-natured person—man or woman, it matters not which—will never be mean or spiteful in word or deed. He will never knowingly hurt another's feelings, or injure his prospects in life. He will not seek to take advantage of a fellow-creature's folly or misfortune to advance his own interests; far less will he be capable of facilitating the ruin of some weaker soul in order to secure his own fortunes. For the good-natured man must, above all things be good, else he can never be good-natured in the highest and best sense of the word. To be easy-going and indulgent is not enough.

To the Public.

I have just fitted up, in my store room, a neat optical parlor which I have supplied with all the latest methods of examining and scientifically fitting the eyes with glasses, including the Ophthalmoscope test case, Skiascope Ophthalmometer and shadow test. Having taken a practical course in those studies and received certificates from two of the best schools of the kind in the country, and with five years experience I do not hesitate to place myself before the public and ask your patronage in this line.
