A Description of Cripple Creek by Jan. B. Arnold. The morning sun had only begun to chase away the mists of the night, as I stood upon the mountain side viewing this great work of art by that master of all painters, "Jack Frest," Beginning at the foot hills in the valley where the frost had only touched the leaves lightly, changing, as they do, from the deep green to the red and orange and some of the leaves shaded with the most beautiful colorings, and yet in all their beauty they tell us our summer is dying. Like the sweet faced babe upon whose cheek the dreaded fever has left its flush, yet the instinct of the mother tells her it is the fading away of the sweet flower. Below me in the valley. just brushing from her eyes the cobwebs of the night, is the best advertised city in the world to-day, "Cripple Creek," the golden. I hardly know how to begin to describe to you this cloud kissed city of the west. The boom-boom of explosions that you hear upon every side, as blast after blast lets go with a mighty force, tearing from mother earth the treasure she has held for untold centuries, the clang of steel upon steel sounding like the echo of a far away bell, as the drill is sent deeper into the gold bearing rock that has almost the hardness of steel. Cripple Creek is the heart of the golden El Dorado and her 20,000 inhabitants live 10,400 feet above the sea. It is a city in the clouds, and yet one of the greatest mining camps in the world. A place where men have gotten as high up as they can live, yet spend their time in going down into the bowels of the earth. It is a city of no particular beauty in itself, but it is set in a frame of magnificence and splendor. It was the boast of Europe some years ago that the monastery of Saint Bernard was the highest building in that country, being 8,200 feet above the level of the sea. Then Sicily, not to be outdone, erected an observatory upon Etna 9,200 feet above sea level, and they thought they had done wonders. Yet here is a city 1,200 feet higher, and within a gun shot of where I stand is the town of Aultman, 10,700 feet above sea level, said to be the highest incorporated town in the world. Frost every month in the year pays its visit to Aultman. Five months ago the city of Cripple Creek was almost swept from the face of the earth by two disastrous fires, causing a loss of over a million dollars. Yet not for a single moment did this great calamity check her wonderful financial progress. Her great wealth was in the bowels of the earth, and work never stopped for a single moment, and before the fires had died down thousands of dollars of the golden ore was being hoisted from her great mines, and to-day she has risen from her ashes as if by magic, in the form of magnicent brick blocks, and her baptism of fire of only five months ago has almost been forgotten. One million dollars in gold was taken from the Cripple Creek district last month, and this month they expect to ship one million, two hundred thousand dollars, and as the mines grow richer as they grow deeper, there is no telling what the camp will produce in the months to come. The rock is so hard that mining is expensive. For example, I will take the Abe Lincoln mine. Our shaft is 6x10 feet and the contract price for mining is $15 a foot, and at this price the miner only averages about three dollars a day and is working in water all the time. Work never stops day or night. Three crews, 5 each, working eight hours keeps the machinery going twenty-four hours steadily. I have been asked if it was not a good place to find work and to this question I will have to say, no, as laborers are plenty here. The electric displays in the show windows of the stores are simply wonderful, putting to shame some of our largest stores in the east. The streets are so crowded that you have to push yourself through the crowds, and every once in awhile you see the gleam of a shining revolver, just to tell you in its silent way that it is a good thing to attend to your own business. This not a healthy place for John Chinaman, as not one is allowed to come within the city limits. The tenth of every month is pay day in the district, and $300,000 is paid out in cash. Vice in every form has taken up her abode in this place, not hidden behind closed doors, but all open to the view of the passing crowd, and a walk in the evening through the streets to one not used to such sights, makes you long for the atmosphere of purity. This is my last night in the place and, climbing a high elevation, I take a last look. To my right is the city of the dead, its many headstones glistening in the moonlight, silent sentinels of the last resting place of the departed. Down in the valley the city, gleaming with its many brilliant lights, flashing out into the darkness with the brilliancy of many gems. Towering 14,474 feet is Blanca Peak, on the Sangre de Cristo range, clad in its winding sheet of snow. I again take a last look at the city in the distance, a perfect Sodom on earth, and wonder if it will take a baptism of fire from heaven to purify it, as it takes the fiery furnace to purify the gold its inhabitants take from the mines.
