Tou may go to the devil!" said Jocelyn, pushing back the check book, though not without an effort. "I'll have you to know that money's not the only thing I'm after. I've got my own views about the girl, and I'll manage the business my own way.

The impresario detached the check from the book, and having rolled it into an allumette lit his cigar with it. "That's all right," said he, crushing the burnt remnant under his foot, "only don't you talk to me no more about betting! I know a man when I clap eyes on him, and I know a woman, too, and I guess you'll have time to grow to be a bugger rascal than you are before you rope in my prima donna! She's meet for your betters, my boy, and they're not far to look for?"

Joselyn contrived to maintain a contemptuously indifferent demeanor, but it is certain that whoever made money out of the impresario was obliged to earn it in one way or another.

Meanwhile Miss Beatrix Randolph, or the Marana, as all the world now called her, was in more cheerful spirits than she had been before her reception at the Dinsmores. She liked the Dinsmores; she was inclined to like almost everybody. She tried to take a charitable view even of the young gentlemen in high shirt collars who complimented her so badly, and said things which she knew were witty only because they laughed at them. She reflected that she knew nothing of the freemasonry of medern so-ciety, and that probably the young gen-tlemen intended only to be polite and entertaining. Mrs. Bemax, when appealed to on the subject, said they—Mr. Witman and the rest of them—were wealthy and well connected, and that it was desirable for a lady connected with the stage to cultivate their acquaintance. "A little social relaxation is an excellent thing for you, my dear mademoiselle," declared this worthy lady, "and a capital way to get rid of that little frigidity and stiffness you have brought with you from the country. Ladies connected with the stage have to work hard. but, en revanche, they are allowed mere freedom in social intercourse than other people. It will be quite proper for you to let Mr. Witman drive you home from rehearsal in his brougham if I am along, or even without me at a piach. All the others do it. You will not let him take any liberties, of course; but don't betray any tamidity; he wouldn't understand it."

"It is one thing for me to do as I like," replied mademoiselle, "and another thing for me to let other people do as they like. I don't mean to be stiff, but there is no reason why I should be bothered either.' "It will be no bother when you ar used to it," Mrs. Bemax replied; but at the time she did not advocate her view any farther. The finishing touches were being put to the theatre, and Geoffrey Bellingham was constantly on hand to oversee the work; consequently he and the prima donna must needs meet occasionally. He said very little to her, and was generally very busy when she might have entered into conversation with him; but she had an impression that he kept his eyes upon her often when she was not looking at him; and his appearance at the theatre was generally coincident with the hour of her rehearsals. One day after she had been singing a grand scene very effectively she happened to catch his eye in the stage box, where he stood leaning against the curtained partition, abstractedly knotting and unknotting a piece of tape. His gaze was so earnest, and at the same time so melancholy, that the prima donna, obeying an impulse that was partly curiosity, but partly some-thing else, went round to the box when the scene was over, and met him as he was coming out. "How unhappy you looked!" she said. "Was anything wrong?" He stared at her for a moment, and said ironically. "Oh, you're a great artiste!" "I mean to be," she answered smiling. "A great actress, too! I should like to see you when you are yourself."

"I am myself now," replied Mile. Marana. Then she remembered that she was not telling the whole truth, and blushed and looked down.

"Then you must be a remarkable woman! But you probably don't know that you always appear to me like a and innocent American girl. I can't see anything foreign or—stagey in your talk or manners. Extremes meet, suppose, and, like Paul, you are all things to all men.'

This speech made the young diva feel that the world was very wide and very cruel, and tears came into her eyes She was alone; there was no one to answer for her or to protect her. She would not have minded so much what most people thought of her, but it would have been a great comfort to her if this man, at any rate, had by some divine faculty of vision been able to see through the disguise that veiled her from the rest of the world. He did see through it; but he did not believe what he saw. He thought that his discovery was her deception, and the more she was frank and simple, the more she was her real self, the less would be believe in her. It was a dilemma between intuition and tenson; and, with a man of the world, reason, in such cases, is apt to have the

It would have been easy for the prima donna to have enlightened 1, in, and under certain circumstances sies might have been tempted to do so. But now it was a matter of pride to her, if noth-ing else, to say no word that could lead him to infer that his sympathy was any thing to her one way or the other. But she was at liberty to resent an insult. and she felt that to do so would help her to preserve her complete a. "You probably don't know, sir," she said, imitating his phrase, "that to call even an opera singer the extreme opposite of fresh and innocent is not polite I am not so contemptible a thing to all men as I seem to be to you!"

"It was a brutal thing to say, and I did not mean it," he replied in a low voice. "But I can't say what I wish to you. There's no middle way." And be-fore she could make up her mind what this meant he passed by her and walked heavily away down the corridor.

The prima donna fell into a deep and not altogether painful revery. She seat-ed herself on a bench behind the scenes and followed out her musings with her chin on her hand. The rehearsal was going forward in front, the duets, the quartets and the choruses, but she was lost in thought. "There's no middle What was in his mind-in his way. heart-when he said that? There had been something very potent in his eyes, that she was sure of. What eyes he had! What a stern, resolute face, with nothing mean or commonplace in it! He was not like the others, either in aspect or in manner. His very carelessness and roughness were more high bred than their best behavior. Though he might go among other men, he would always be apart from them; he was lonely, like herself, but, unlike hers, his was a voluntary and a noble loneliness. And he despised her because because some other woman was despicable! That was unjust, and yet perhaps there was in alvertent justice in it. Pechaps, if he knew the truth, he would despise her no less on other grounds. But again there was some other feeling beside contempt at work within him. What could that be? The girl raised her head slightly. with a doubtful, musing smile on her

There was a stealthy step behind her which she did not hear until it was clos-upon her. Then suddenly agair of hands were pressed over her eyes, and her head was brawn back. For a mement she was 200 much amazed to resist; besides, she thought it must be-could not but some one who had a right to treat her so -her father, or even her brother Ed: no stranger would dare! Any impossibility was more possible than that. The next moment she felt lesses on her cheek and mouth-clumsy, offensive kisses. She was not a screaming woman, but she gave a passionate ontery of disgust. twisted herself free, and sprang to ber

The offender stood before her, evidently Lot at all convinced of the enormity of his outrage. His visage was wrinkled into:a waggish faugh, in which he seem ed to expect the prima donna to join. It had aiready been made apparent to her that the man had been drinking, but the misted wrath in her eyes kept her for an instant from recognizing in him the wly engaged musical director. Herr Plotowski. She felt that if she had had a weapon in her hand she could have killed him on the spot. And he was hanghing!

"Aha! my bearaiful ana'm'selle! I catch you fair dat time!" he exclaimed jovially. "Oh! dose beautiful lips! I haf often long to salute dem!"

"If you ever come mearing or speak to me again"—began the prima donna; but she checked herself. She would not condescend even te threaten such a wretch. Besides, what power had she to carry a threat into execution? Herr Plotowski had been engaged at great expense; he was considered a valuable acquisition. No one could lead an orchestra more ably than he. If she complained of him her complaint would be put off ar disregarded; nor could she bring herself to confide the outrage to a man like Gen. Inigo. He would be sure to langh, and answer with some poarse, good humored jest. In this new world she had entered into everybody seemed to make a jest of everything There was no one to defend her; she must submit if she could not defend herself. But, as her glance fell upon Herr Plotowski, she told herself would rather die than submit to such another insult.

Her passionate indignation must have made itself perceptible through the or wool and callous hide of the director, fortified new location.

though he was by whisky. The wrin.sled laugh gradually faded from his count nance, and gave place to an expression of absurd solemnity and irritation.
"You be angry dat I kiss you, the brief in a barsh voice. "Let me tell you, ma'm'selle, I kiss all ze ladies vot sing by me. Zey daile it as compliment; if not, I make it worse for zem, chr Plotowski hiss all he please, and dat all right, ain't it? You ask ze general, and you find out! Now den!" And he stalked away hanghtily.

This incident would perhaps have af-fected her somewhat less poignantly if it had not occurred immediately after her interview with Bellingham, and while her thoughts were full of him. The revulsion was almost unendurable. and made her feel as if the pollution could never be removed. Her bosom heaved, and bitter tenra ran down her face. A woman is helpless enough at best, but she more than the rest, because she was fighting an ser a false name at reputation. Novertheless, allo como not retreat now a or give up the Lattic. sho knew that her father had incurred pecunicry obligations to Inigo which could only be regist through her. Besides, should sue let her career be de-stroyed at the outset because a creature like Plotowski had insulted her? Should she not rather persevere until she had won such position and such power as should emale her to protect heraclf against all the world? There was a proud, unconquered spirit in her, which asserted itself in her forformess and distress more them it had ever done in her security and happiness.

And, ofter all, she was not without friends. At the worst she could apply to her father; and then there was Hat ilton Jocelyn, who, although rath a worldly and absurd, was really a good man, with her interests at heart, as was proved by his having obtained for her this splendid engagement, and flore was Mr. Dinsmore, who seemed kindly and a gentleman; and Mr. Barelyffe, who had written all that praise of her in the newspaper; and there, too, was Geoffrey Bellingham; whatever his opinion of her might be, she did not believe that he would have stood by and allowed Herr Plotowski to insult her. Not things were not so hopeless, after all. Mme. Bemax had been out to make a few purchases on Broadway. She now returned, carrying her little bandles by loops in the strings that tied them. She hoped mademoiselle had not been delayed or inconvenienced. Mademoiselle replied that she had not been delayed; but something prevented her from telling Mme. Bemax about the adventure with the director. She feared madame would say something about the benefits of a little social relaxation and about getting used to it; and she did not wish to feel an aversion toward the good lady, who was in many respects agreeable to her. So she held her peace and hid her secrets in her heart; but she could not forget them.

A Parliament Custom. Before the speech from the throne is read, when the houses are resumed in the afternoon, by the lord chancellor in the house of lords and the speaker in the house of commons, it is the practice in both houses to read one bill a first time pro forma in order to assert their right of deliberation without reference to the immediate cause of summons. This practice is enjoined in the house of lords by a standing order. In the house of commons the same form is observed pursuant to ancient custom and of the following resolution, passed March 22, 1602: "That the first day of every sitting in every parliament some one bill, and no more, receiveth a first reading for form sake." In the house of commons the clerk of parliaments produces an ancient document which has served this purpose for at least a century, en-"A bill for effectually preventing clandestine outlawries," which is duly read a first time and ordered to be read a second time and will never be heard of again till the opening of the next session.—London News.

Marvelous Mechanism of the Human Body. The human body is an epitome in nature of all mechanics, all hydraulies, all architecture, all machinery of every kind. There are more than 310 mechanical movements known to mechanics today, and all of these are but modifications of those found in the human body. Here are found all the bars, levers, joints, pulleys, pumps, pipes, wheels and axles, ball and socket movements, beams, girders, trusses, buffers, arches, columns, cables and supports known to science. At every point man's best mechanical work can be shown to be but adaptations of processes of the human body, a revelation of first principles used in nature.—William George Jordan in Ladies' Home Journal.

Some Comical Bulls.

A very absentminded German professor named Johannes Amer lately died at Vienna, and the following are a few of his remarkable bulls:

"Julius Casar, disguised as a slave, swam naked across the Tiber."
"Covered with innumerable wounds, Caesar fell dead near Pompey's statue. With one hand he covered his face with his toga, with the other he called for help."
