Perhaps the most romantic of modern adventures was the project of M. Andre to sail thousands of miles in a balloon and cross the North Pole. He started on his trip, but has never been heard of since, and the end of all his planning was probably a lonely death in the dreary land of the north. But the curiosity of man knows no such word as failure, neither considers death as worthy of heed. At the pole, in every possibility, is a land covered with hostile ice, or at best only a sea inhabited by a few walrus and seal, yet there are in the polar regions at present no less than four exploring expeditions, each fitted out at a cost of several hundred thousand dollars, and two more will start next summer. In front of all these hardy adventurers is the faint hope of seeing what no man has ever seen before—a land undiscovered—and the far likelier possibility of meeting the grim king of terrors—death—in the hostile ice.

When the war lord of Germany remarks that if certain transactions with America do not end as he wishes he'll proceed to "smash things," one has visions of flying bullets and the rattling of the sabre. But Kaiser Wilhelm has a habit of sending chills down his neighbors' backs just for the glory of notoriety, and since his accession in 1890 he has managed to attract more attention to himself than all the other rulers of Europe combined. He talks of war as though it were the harmless play of children and on one occasion gave expression to such barbarous sentiments of revenge and cruelty as to baffle the civilization he professes. There is in him much of the spirit that made Alexander weep for more worlds to conquer; that made Caesar shed tears that he had done so little to perpetuate his fame; that impelled the valorous Akbar, Mohammedan captain of the hosts of God to spur his horse knee deep in the ocean and with waving sword lament to the Almighty that there were no more countries to subdue. It is the spirit of bravado that men foolishly admire and history immortalizes. War is the realistic reproduction of Inferno, but so fascinating is the play of the demons that it is the surest road to eternal fame in the records of men. So it is not surprising that a prince who ever seeks notoriety should indulge in such barbarous sentiments as Kaiser Wilhelm has been guilty of during his reign.

In England, but thirty years ago, women were used in the mines instead of mules to draw the coal cars underground. Worse, they were made to go where mules could not go. On hands and knees, naked but for rough sack cloth trousers, with leather collar and chain attached they drew heavy cars of coal to the mouth of the mine, and many of them seldom saw the light of day, eating, sleeping and spending all of life with no other surroundings than the hideous darkness of a mine forty, sixty and even one hundred feet beneath the surface of the earth. So tenacious was this practice that legislative enactment was necessary to stop it. And this but thirty years ago. In France not much farther back than the time of our own civil war, it was thought just to a certain class of criminals, not the worst either, to put them in a narrow stone dungeon, with iron collar around their neck, a chain attached to this collar fast to the ceiling so that they could not sit down, and iron bracelets on their arms. In this cruel position they were forced to stand for months, often ankle deep in mud and mire and filth, for these cells were seldom cleaned out. Their food, scanty and unclean, was cast to them, often mingled with the filth of their dungeon. This is horrible, and yet it is the civilization of but thirty years ago, of nations, too, extolling the sweet purity and love of the Man of Galilee.
