Delightful Hallowe'en Party.
"Come at witching hour of eight
And let the fairies read your fate.
Reveal to none this secret plot
Or woe—not luck will be your lot."
This unique verse was the means of collecting about forty of Edith and Lena Herpel's friends together for a real Hallowe'en party last Saturday evening. As the guests approached the house the only visible sign of life was a large jack-o-lantern in corner of front porch. They were received at the door and directed upstairs, where to their horror they perceived two weird objects commonly designated as ghosts, who in their weird way directed each one where he should deposit his or her wraps. The guests then assembled in the down stairs rooms, which, like the porch, were illuminated by jack-o-lanterns.
After all the guests had assembled, they were in turn introduced to the three witches, who gave them an inkling of the future. Following this refreshments, especially appropriate for a hallowe'en party, were served.
The party then entered upon a very trying ordeal, that of biting an apple suspended from the ceiling by a string. The contestants were blindfolded, then turned around several times and then they started in what they thought the direction of the suspended apple. A few found the apple, but a great many came far short of the mark and although almost desperate were compelled to give up the trial. In some inexplicable way, however, Wallace Mitchell succeeded in getting the largest bite and of course was granted the prize.
At about 11.15 the party started on a grand march. They formed in line in parlor, sitting and dining room. After getting well in line they were led upstairs, down back stairs, and out through the cellar. They followed their leader through all sorts of places until about 11.50 when they returned to Herpel's. After paying respects to the sisters each one wended his homeward journey, well satisfied with their evening.
A GUEST.
