THE STATE GRANGE.

J. T. Ailman, Press Correspondent.

There is no danger of race suicide, national suicide or any other great evil among a class of people who are industrious, prosperous and contented, people who must work because they are not able to live without it and who are not yet driven by want, not enervated by poverty, on the one hand nor by luxury on the other. Such is the American farmer. That he may remain such he must be vigilant. He needs to have a clear understanding of the agencies for good and evil that are at work in the land. With one hand he must help the good and with the other restrain the evil. He cannot afford to be passive and expect to remain unharmed. If he hopes to hear the "Well Done" of the good christian and to be regarded as a worthy descendant of the men who founded the Republic he must see to it that he gets for his own use the full measure of the wealth he produces. Anything less means that his class must step to a lower plain of living. This continued long enough leads to serfdom. The farmers in the grange are jealously guarding the interests of the farm. How is it with those outside?

One man among 80,000,000 is indeed but a human atom. To command attention he must be endowed with great ability and must be possessed of great attainments. Even then the most he can do is to influence and persuade. To command he must have associated with him a large number of his fellows whose ways of thinking and whose interests are identical with his own. If this is true of earth's greatest, where does the average individual stand? Alone he is pitifully helpless. He can hope to have his rights recognized and his interests protected only when through organization he has the co-operation of others working in the same line.

The enterprising farmer is realizing this in these latter days and as a result the Grange continues to grow.

Cruising in Southern Waters.

D. M. Dunamore, Sr., received a letter a few days ago from his son, Duncan M. Dunamore, Jr., written on board the U. S. Cruiser, "Colorado," at Culebra, Virgin Islands, West Indies. In speaking of the trip from Newport News, Dunamore says: "We passed Old Fort Comfort, where I saw Fortresses Monroe, Rip Raps and the buoy marking the place where the frigate, "Cumberland," sank after being rammed by the "Merrimac." All of these are good old civil war relics. When we passed Hatteras we had very rough weather. The "Colorado," in spite of her size, pitched around pretty bad. Unfortunately, I was on watch from 12.00 to 4.00 that night and I was not feeling well, though not actually seasick. We saw a great many flying-fish. It is very interesting to watch them. They rise about two feet above the water and skim along for thirty or forty feet before dropping.

It seems strange that one week ago we were in a cold country and here everything is green. Culebra is about 160 miles east of San Juan. There are but few houses on the island and a company of marines. We can see coffee, coconuts, bananas and other tropic fruits growing on shore. The houses are mostly made of grass, woven on the walls and thatched on top. The houses are perched on trees or four little sticks and look as though a good breeze would blow them over. The people are mostly negroes. To-morrow is my liberty day and I am going ashore to get some souvenirs."

Three Old Bots.

Last Sunday morning three distressed and dishevelled looking men staggered back into the alley beside the Spirit office. Two of them were middle-aged, blue-eyed, wretched appearing individuals, and the third was young and strong. They huddled together, trembling and shivering, and produced a pint flask of whiskey, from which they all drank. Whiskey had brought them to that state, and they were appealing to whiskey to get them out of it. A more complete picture of misery could scarcely be imagined. The whiskey was evidently not palatable, for they all made faces at it as though it nearly strangled them going down their parched and inflamed throats. But what they drank last night had left their nervous systems in such a state of collapse and utter mental and physical depression, that the flame must be re-kindled by additional draughts of the fiery fluid. Man is supposed to be the only animal endowed with the faculty of reason, but we know of no other animal so profoundly indifferent to its own well-being and happiness as to eat or drink that which it knows will reduce it to abject misery and degradation.—Punxsutawney Spirit.
