Miss Marr was a very sweet and accomplished girl of eighteen, and no one wondered that the gentlemen found so much pleasure in her society. She saw how bitter a feeling she had been

Frank Osgood was very generally known to those present, and was, of course, instantly recognized. Walking up to the prisoner, Harry Cummings, the long-missing man gave him his hand cordially, which created another burst of applause, and it was absolutely necessary to clear the court room before further legal proceedings could take place, owing to the reigning excitement among the spectators. All was soon explained. The night before his disappearance Frank had made an avowal of his love of Mary Marr, and had been firmly but delicately refused. This so morti and fied and embittered him at first that he became almost crazed. He did not go to bed that night at all, but, jumping out of the low window, wandered he knew not whither. Finally coming to the shore, he saw a ship just letting go her moorings to drop down to sea with the morning tide. She was bound for South America. Hardly knowing what he did, Frank went on board and sailed on her. Sen life soon restored him to his normal condition. Absence cured him also of his unrequited love, and he sought the earliest means of returning to England. It was before the cable had been laid, and so he brought the news of his own safety in person, arriving the very morning when he appeared in court.

The bitterness between the former friends seemed to increase daily, until finally meeting by themselves, they deliberately proposed to each other to seek some quiet spot and to settle their pretensions to the hand of Miss Marr with pistols.

This was but a few years since, when resort to the duel in England was scarcely heard of. But so much in carnest were these rivals that they agreed to this plan, selected the spot for the purpose, and made, very secretly the necessary arrangements. When, by some mistake all was discovered, they were brought before the local court and put under heavy bonds to respect the laws and to behave themselves properly. This ended the proposed duel, though they had been quite in earnest.

The families of Osgood and Cummings lived in outlying cottage houses in the suburbs of Bristol, and not far separated from each other, all the othmembert of these families being on the best of terms.

One morning the neighborhod became very much excited over the fact that Frank Osgood was missing. The window of his room was open and very near the ground, by which means tain tracks indicated that he had soft his father's house. He had taken nothing away with him except the dothes he usually wore, so far as could be discovered, and after a whole day's search for him the matter of his sudden disappearance began to look quite

r for him. She wa she said, and just remembered the fact, but nothing more. She could not even tell the time, but thought it was after midnight. She did not noice her young master's appearance on the occasion, as she was half asleep at the time. Such was the girl's simple evidence.

Harry Cummings was now arrested and thrown into prison. Evidence sufficient was thought to exist to implicate him, and the cry once raised, public opinion gradually set against him. The proposed duel, the known bitterness existing between him and the missing man, the footprints exactly fitting those of his own shoes, his absence from home on that special night at an unusual hour, all seemed to point to complicity in his former friend's disappearance, nearly as strongly as circumstantial evidence could do. Of course, the accused procured the best possible legal assistance, found no difficulty in convincing his counsel of his innocence of the charge brought against him, but at the same time the legal gentleman was compelled to admit that there was considerable ground for a case against his client. Harry explained to his lawyer that he had taken a long walk that evening into the country, and in an absorbed frame of mind had gone further than he knew of, and that when he turned to come home, he was himself surprised at the distance he had walked. This was the cause of his not getting home that Tuesday night until just after midnight.

"What were you thinking about to absorb you so?" asked his lawyer. "Miss Marr," said Harry, frankly.

"I was making up my mind to propose to her, and was weighing the proper course to pursue in case I found her indifferent, or if there should be any obstacies raised. It may seem a slight matter to you," he continued to his legal adviser, "but it was all absorbing to me, and I neither saw nor heard what was going on about me." "You did not meet anyone?" names will henceforth be associated by an idea. I give this merely as a random and clumsy illustration of the principle, a principle which is certainly capable of marvelous elaboration and wide application. It can be utilized to memorize a list for shopping just as successfully as the heads of an argument or the good tales heard at the club.

The treatment of numbers is, and must be, more arbitrary and much more artificial. Numerals are not connected with ideas, and cannot therefore, as numerals, be connected one with another. But if one begins by laying down that the first nine letters of the alphabet shall stand respectively for the nine numerals, and O for naught, all the other letters remaining meaningless, one instantly has a basis upon which to construct associations.

A first class system of memory training will neither be random nor clumsy. It will be carefully planned and worked out so as to gain the greatest possible end by the smallest means. It will be full of minor ingenuities. It will be adaptable, elastic and comprehensive.

socialistic France has raised the spy system to a state function, but in Russia it is the very soul of the state. In Moscow, in the streets, agents of the police are stationed every five hundred yards; in addition, secret agents watch the houses day and night-one being allotted to every four houses; and in every house is another spy, the porter. Go where you will, you are never out of the watchful eye of the police. You brush against sples in your hotel, as in the theatres: in a restaurant, as in the drawing room of a friend. It is ridiculously easy to recognize those you meet in the fashionable resorts. They have evidently been instructed to disguise themselves as gentlemen, and for one of them the livery of a gentleman is a frock coat, a silk hat, and, always-by rain or sunlight-an umbrella. The famous third police! A stranger might fancy that, in an open cab-talkng Fernch or English to his friend-he would at least be safe from surveillance; but his friend will touch him significantly and speak of the weather. The fat cabby on the box, somnolent, with white hair and good paternal eves, may be a spy, more skilled in the languages than the traveling stranger; and, if the cabman has been found loitering near the great clubs, the hotels, or the embassies, the chances are strong that he is. A subtler police than that of the third section-the akrana, which has its rumifications in every capital in Europe and America-completes this great system of espionage.
