ELECTRICIAN KILLED SUNDAY.

Charles Babcock, Chief Engineer at Florence Power House, Electrocutted. Sunday morning, July 29, 1906, Charles Babcock, chief engineer at the Jefferson Traction Company's power house in Florence, was instantly killed by coming into contact with a field coil on the machinery. The large engine at that power house had been shut down about 7.30 in the morning, two smaller engines doing all the work, but by an oversight the knives controlling the electric current on coils of large dynamo were not pulled out. Babcock and another workman had been cleaning up and while the other was oiling the machinery Babcock leaned over the rear of the large engine to get some blocks laying underneath. The first intimation the other workman had of the accident was the smell of burning hair. They looked for Babcock, but he was lying in such a position that only his feet were visible and these moved, as if the man were alive. Finally they called to him, but received no answer and on going to him discovered that the feet were moving because the body was heavily charged with electricity. In leaning over the engine the back of his head touched a coil charged with 550 volts of electricity and death was instantaneous.

Remarkable Strike.

The strike just ended in the bituminous coal mines of Western Pennsylvania, considering its magnitude, was, beyond question, the most orderly one in the history of the mining industry. In the midst of ejections and all the exasperations incident to an industrial war the miners of this community, among whom some of the most turbulent and hot blooded foreigners are represented, were remarkably cool and self-possessed. There were, of course, occasional acts of rashness and disorder, but few, if any, more than when the mines are running in the regular way. For this exhibition of self-control under trying circumstances the miners and their leaders deserve great credit, and no doubt obtained a much better settlement than could have been secured had they lost their heads. It is encouraging to note that as this country grows older it is becoming more law-abiding, better legislation for the masses is being enacted and the laws are better enforced. The improvement in this line has been especially marked within the past four or five years, and much of the credit is due to our energetic and justice-loving President, who is sincerely desirous that everybody should have a square deal.—Punxsutawney Spirit.

Henry M. Iseman, street commissioner of Reynoldsville borough, died suddenly near Wishaw last Friday morning, July 27, 1906, while riding along the public highway in the Reynoldsville Hardware Co. delivery wagon. Mr. Iseman was sitting on the seat with William Yount, the driver, with whom he was talking, when he suddenly ceased talking and fell over against Mr. Yount. Wilber Ellenberger was sitting on rear end of wagon and Mr. Yount said to him, "this man must be sick." They thought he had fainted and laid him on ground and put some water on his face, but discovered then that he was dead. He passed away without a tremor. Heart disease was cause of his sudden demise. Mr. Iseman had been in poor health for three years, but was able to be around and attend to his work as street commissioner. He had been a resident of Reynoldsville a number of years and was well known in this section, and his sudden death was a shock to his many friends.
