HIS OWN PORTRAIT.

How an Artist Paints a Picture of Himself.

It has been a common practice with artists of all ages and conntries to. paint their own pictures, and at the Uffizi gallery in Florence can be seen a magnificent collection of pertraits of the world's great painters done by themselves it is a covered bount to be invited to contribute one's own portrait to this collection, for one most be emipent before this compliment is said. As may be easily understood, painting one's own portrait is a somewhat from blesome task, for the painter must do a good deal from memory, especially if he puts blinself to an attitude which it is difficult to reflect in a mirror. A straightforward partrait looking out of the pleture is obviously the easiest to manage, for the palater has only to place the mirror in front of him to see

Triple and quadraple ultrors must be employed when the altitude is in any way removed from 1931 faces A profile would be more difficult to see for opeself, but a three-quarter face would be no less an as in tests causes the artist would be working from a tr Beetled of a reflection which to say the least of it, is a bettlering condition. The looking at oneself for a long time is one of the strange and trying socialitions of painting one's area per train, for difficulties and complexities appear to grow the there one trice to grapple with them.
