BITS OF BY-PLAY

And what's become of the old-fashioned man who used to carry an old copper cent, about the size of a soup plate, in his pocket "for luck"?

Most women wish to retain their youthful beauty; others pour kerosene in the kitchen stove.

Before marriage he used to bring her fancy boxes of the best chocolates; now she burns her fingers making her own.

The man who was the prize declaimer at school now has a job telling his small daughter all about the "Hoofed Princess."

Some men not only borrow trouble; they pay cash for it.

When Baby toddles around he has to hold on to a chair or the table; when Big Sister toddles she has to hold on to a man.

Father thinks the boy is grown up now and old enough to take care of him self. Mother knows he isn't and never will be. Father isn't that old yet.

About the time a girl starts to wear a solitaire there is pretty sure to be some other girl in town who will say: "Well, I suppose she likes him, but I can't see what she sees in him!"

And how a girl whose nose gets red hates to see winter coming!

Reformers may rive, legislators pass laws, and men "poke" fun, but woman, lovely woman, will do just as she has always done—and wear what she do-gone-please.

A man may fill one side of his mouth with tobacco until he resembles a bad case of mumps; but that doesn't seem to help him to understand why a girl chews gum.

The old-fashioned man who used to go down to the depot every day to see the 4-10 come in now has a son who hangs around the corner and watches the girls get on the cars.

Walnuts, chestnuts and most other nuts ripen in the fall. But the nut who "steps on the gas" is always with

A Yuletide Blessing

By [unclear]

HERBERT CHEER was in his study when the bells had a special ring for Ned Graham as he came over the gift boxes and how the melodious clang of the gongs along the corridors made perfect sense to him. His enraptured ears appeared to ring and all for him, he almost could remember where peace and good will to men had a real meaning, and himself a part of it!

Left an orphan at eight, for five years he had been a miserably old being. Then Wade a distant relative, as wife Alice had taken Ned to the little home. "You have never seen to you for and a blessing on you," the village clergyman had said, and in large letters on the door he had written: "Ned Graham, good mother that way in the world sturdily to a chum. 'Some' is going to let him know how he is to the best two people who lived."

Mr. and Mrs. had gone to a Christmas party and Ned was speeding homeward of holiday plans.

Dashing thru gateway Ned came to a sudden light showed in the parlor, the window of the room was open and a man was seen to be a roving man tossing over the group under the little tree.

"It's a burglar!" the startled Ned, "and our Christmas presents! Hooray out of there or I'll shoot 'em bullets!" and

A Rough Appearing Being Over the Pat

Ned ran to the window and drew a revolver from its case and presented it in menacing view.

The intruder vanished from the room into the night disappeared. A vainly hunt, Ned went back to the parlor the first moment noticing a watch lying open on a chair. That thrilled him to observe strange articles of steel within.

"Burglars!" muttered Ned, fairly awed. "And a great big wallet stuffed full of gold and bank notes, and right as I was stamping the name of Martin Brill on the envelope." "Say! This fellow has robbed the old man before me here."

Half an hour later, Ned was in the garden of the Brill place. He saw Brill tied to a tree and striving to dislodge a gag from his mouth. He was frantic; he tore at the gag, and finally he babbled to Ned, "You're the man! You're the man!"

"You're the man!" Ned repeated. "You're the man!"

"Say! Interpose!" "If you'll come with the I'll get your wallet back."

"What—why—where?"

"To your daughter's room. If you want your wallet back you must go with me there."

Half-distracted, Ned followed Martin Brill to a room. He produced the wallet and restored it to its owner.

"Oh! Had you ever seen that?" "I had," cried the old man, "but I had never seen that portrait of myself!"

"Mr. Wade got that for that," said Ned, "and you'll see it in the paper."

Martin Brill sat at the portrait, a dim light in his eyes. Ned stole quietly to the door and heard footsteps on the porch. "Sh!" he whispered. "Mother, you've got to be careful. Why, who is it?"

"Santa Claus, I think," was the prompt response. "It was
