TARIFF REDUCES FARM MARKETS

With Factories Closed Consumers Cannot Purchase.

CUBA WAS A BIG BUYER

Cannot Export Produce Unless Other Countries Can Sell Us.

By M. E. MILES,
Chairman of the Fair Tariff League.

In a small town in an agricultural section of the United States, not far from the Canadian border, there is a glove factory. This concern has been for years selling a large part of its product annually in Canada. Congress in the Emergency Tariff Act placed on goods imported from Canada a tariff so high that it made it impossible for the Canadian importer to sell their goods in the American market. The small town glove factory, seeing their market closed, had to shut down.

It is an economic law that a nation buys where it sells. It must do this in order to have money to pay the bills in the country where the bills are contracted.

Canada being unable to buy her goods in this country was forced to sell her surplus elsewhere. Naturally, then, she supplied her needs in other markets. But this particular glove factory is important because of its effect on the prosperity of the nearby farmers.

The plight of this factory is an example of how the prosperity of every interest in this country is dependent upon the prosperity of practically every other interest. This glove factory is the mainstay of the town. Practically all the wage earners work there. When their means of livelihood was cut off their ability to purchase was gone.

The smaller farmers had a ready market at their very doors for their butter and eggs and other farm products found it necessary to seek other and less satisfactory markets out of town. But when they got out into the world market they found that something was happening. Everything they tried to sell was sold at a greatly reduced price, but everything that they attempted to buy they found was reduced only slightly in price or not reduced at all.

The Farmer Whipped
Many complicated factors enter into a situation of this kind, but one of the most important factors is the tariff. I have shown in a previous article that in at least two commodities, those of which the tariff protection is accorded by the increased rates on these two commodities does not reach the farmer, but stops with and enriches the manufacturer.

There is a chemical plant in the state of New Jersey which makes a fertilizer product for the Cuban market. Cuba's sugar industry has been practically ruined by a 60 per cent increase in the tariff on raw sugar. Cuba is unable to buy the product of this chemical factory. One thousand men are out of work. The families of these thousand men would use at least a thousand dozen of eggs a week and use less than a thousand pounds of butter and certainly use less than three thousand pounds of meat, all products of the American farmer.

But in the case of Cuba there is even a more direct loss of market to the farmer. A glance at the trade reports shows that Cuba is one of the American farmer's most important customers. In 1920 Cuba purchased of us more than 50 per cent of all our exports of hogs, lard, condensed milk, cocoa and prepared chocolate and corn. She ranked third in the purchase of hams and shoulders, miscellaneous canned meat products, hay and flour. Cuba bought from us during 1919 and 1920 over $5,000,000 worth of truck gardening and farm products, over $6,000,000 worth of live stock, over $15,000,000 worth of dairy products, over $90,000,000 worth of meat products, over $23,000,000 worth of cotton cloth and over $20,000,000 worth of manufactures of cotton.

Farmer Needs Cuban Market
It is pretty evident, then, that the American farmer needs his Cuban market. It is further quite clear that if this enormous quantity of surplus agricultural goods were dumped on the home market his prices would slump still more.

Now, where does Cuba get the money with which to purchase our goods? The answer is "sugar." Cuba produces 4,000,000 tons of sugar annually. This enormous crop is the mainstay of Cuban prosperity. If it fails her, she must go bankrupt. About one-half of her output of sugar she sells in the United States.
