Power belts, such as are used in workshops for transmitting power from a revolving shaft to a machine, have been run at a rate of nearly 5,000 feet per minute, but in practice it is seldom an advantage to run them over 1,000 feet per minute. The same methods that is employed in nickel or silver plating by means of electricity, a thin coat of metal is being deposited by means of battery currents, is now being used to build up "ply-metals," which consist of many layers welded by electricity into one solid mass. By using metals of various sorts a material of amazing strength can be produced.
