CHALLENGE

TO THE DEALER OR OWNER OF ANY AUTOMOBILE THAT IS NOT EQUIPPED WITH FOUR WHEEL BRAKES

For many years past Buick has been accepted as the Standard of Comparison. Already Buick is well on its way toward the two million mark in production, and each season as the refinement of the Buick car develops, more motorists become familiar with its excellence, and the demand increases steadily and surely.

Since the adoption of four wheel brakes, Buick has been subject to no small amount of adverse criticism, which, we feel, has been founded either on jealousy of a superior product, or upon a lack of knowledge concerning the advantages obtained by two additional brakes.

Let the dealer or owner of any automobile not equipped with four-wheel brakes pick the time and place and meet the Buick in a public contest. We will leave the matter of determining the nature of the various tests to be made by all cars up to the parties accepting this challenge, and will guarantee to out-perform them on every point. Our only stipulations are that three or more uninterested men be picked to act as judges, and that the public in general be invited to attend the demonstration. We make this unlimited challenge, not in an antagonistic spirit, but with a desire that the public knows the truth concerning the comparative merits of four-wheel brakes as compared to the two-wheel type.

Anyone interested can complete arrangements by calling Bull 49 and asking for C. J. Fisher, General Manager.

Buick four-wheel brakes on all the new models are another evidence of how the new Buicks meet the motorist's needs. In these days of congested traffic the motorist desires a car that he can stop in a very short distance. Drivers in hilly regions also want a car that will stop surely and easily when required. In order to have proved so reliable on rear wheels during the past twenty years. While this was not possible without redesigning the front axles, Buick did not hesitate to make such a change in order to furnish to the motorist an additional factor of safety.
