Careful Planning Yields Fine Shop

IN EVERY home there are shelves to be made, radios to be repaired, doors to be planed down—something always coming up that needs a handy man with a hammer and saw. Most men and all boys enjoy this sort of work and it becomes a chore only if they do not have proper tools to work with and a proper place to use them.

A regular workshop can be fitted up in nearly every basement with a few hours' work and slight expense. Many builders pay almost as much attention to the basement plan of a new house as to the living quarters. There are a few hard and fast rules to be observed in this: The Holland vapor-air heating plant should preferably be near the center; the position of the stairs is determined by those above; the fuel room must be near the driveway and close to the furnace, and, finally, the laundry tubs are most economically placed beneath the kitchen or bathroom plumbing. But a little ingenuity and intelligent planning usually will leave a good-sized space for an extra room, as in the case of the plan shown here, which was taken from an actual house plan and laid out practically.

The presence of the Holland warm air furnace will keep the workshop warm and dry and with a good circulation of air at the proper humidity. The partitions are of matched lumber or wallboard to standard 2 x 4 uprights. The floor joists above need not be sealed unless for sound-deadening. The masonry walls are not lined but may be painted or whitewashed.

Nothing need be done to the cement floor, as it is the most suitable for this sort of room—easy to sweep and clean and hard to damage. A bit of old rug in front of the workbench is the only covering necessary.

Lighting is an important feature as work undoubtedly will be done at night sometimes. If electricity is available, one or more extension drop cords should be run in, with a high-powered bulb and opaque shades. An adjustable slide slipped on the cord will enable the worker to move it about and hang it over the bench at the right height.

The workbench and its stool should be placed under one of the windows. Build a rack for small tools on the wall above it. Shelves for larger tools, materials and articles in work will keep the room looking passably neat, as will a good-sized hinged box and a large waste basket with solid sides.

STRESSES NEED OF CHILD VACCINATION

"With the exception of one oriental country with its hordes of people, to which even the term sanitation and preventive medicine are unknown, the United States last year had more cases of smallpox than had any other place on earth. And this, in spite of the fact that of all diseases preventable by public health measures, smallpox is the easiest to control," said Dr. Theodore B. Appel, Secretary of Health.

"While Pennsylvania's smallpox record in the more recent years has been a very enviable one, it must be realized that vaccination alone has been responsible for it. And it is this connection the state's vaccination law, which requires that all school children attending public, private or parochial schools must be able to show satisfactory evidence of vaccination, has been an exceedingly effective weapon against this dreaded disease.

"The misconception, however, that only children need to be vaccinated is a more or less general one. Smallpox is no longer a childhood malady. Of the cases reported in Pennsylvania the vast majority for years have been adults who never submitted to vaccination. While smallpox occasionally is seen in children in this state, it has occurred only in the unvaccinated or preschool age in isolated instances also in children whose parents had succeeded in evading the vaccination law.

"Many adults, having been vaccinated in early life, are resting under the false security of life long security, which frequently does not occur.

"By the simple and painless expedient of effective vaccination of every individual in the nation, smallpox, except for imported cases, would be non-existent in the United States. That this disease still shows its power in this country is therefore an indication solely of personal carelessness and of disregard.

"To aid intelligently in Pennsylvania's fight against smallpox, the following rules should be observed:

1. Have all children over one year of age promptly vaccinated. Do not defer until the health authorities insist upon it. The compulsory vaccination law applies equally to the public, private and parochial schools.
2. If one is a mature person and never has been vaccinated, be vaccinated without further delay.
3. If one is a mature person and has not been vaccinated since childhood, consult a physician regarding the necessity of further protection.

FARMERS MAY FIND NEW REVENUE FROM THE STUMPS

"The pot of gold may be in, not under the old walnut tree stump. That is, if they are the right kind of stumps, and if you have enough of them."

That was the information made public yesterday by the officials of the Department of Forests and Waters, who report a good demand for old walnut stumps that are suitable for veneer.

A representative of the department who is making special tree growth studies in Western Pennsylvania has reported that agents in some sections are willing to purchase all walnut stumps that meet the requirements.

He told of one instance near Mount Morris, Greene county, where a farmer gladly accepted $10 for three stumps. The agent agreed to dig them out and haul them away.

The best walnut stumps, officials said, are from large trees cut many years ago. The more aged and gnarled the stump, the better veneer it will make.

HAWK FINDS THAT TURTLE MAKES A GOOD TAXICAB

Visitors at the county fairs where the animal exhibit of the state game commission is being shown are seeing a new adaptation of the old fable of the tortoise and the hare.

A marsh hawk, confined in a cage with several turtles and unable to demonstrate the quick manner in which it can cover space, has learned to be contented with the speed of one of its cage mates.

While confined in the offices of the Commissioner at Harrisburg one of the turtles and the hawk evidently became friendly. Finally the hawk, instead of walking about the cage, spent most of its time perched on the turtle's back. Now the hawk seems satisfied with the slow method of transportation and depends almost entirely upon the movements of the turtle to get about the cage.
