CONSERVATION AND THE FUR SUPPLY

Miss Lillian Bond shown holding the first pelt, a beautiful fox, to be entered in the First National Fur Show.

"An active conservation policy," says the Sears, Roebuck Agricultural Foundation, "is the one sure way to check the decrease of fur-bearing animals in the United States."
When the white man first came to this country it abounded with astonishing numbers of wild animals and birds. Nowhere, except in Africa, could be found such a variety and profusion of wild life. Although our ancestors took heavy toll of both game animals and fur bearers little difference could be noted up to within less than a hundred years ago. But the rapid advance of civilization and increase in population accomplished what trappers and hunters could not. It drove the fur bearers from their breeding grounds and the buffalo from the plains. Tall cities sprang up where at one time the wolf had stalked untroubled. Great bridges spanned the streams once haunted by otter, beaver and mink. Whole forests fell under the settler's axe and the draining of swamps for farming deprived countless fur bearers of their homes. Naturally hundreds of thousands of animals perished, but this was not noticed immediately. The heedless waste went on and on. Demand for furs increased by leaps and bounds. Prices shot up. Not only did trappers trade long before and after the prime season, thereby taking much fur which was practically valueless; but also hunters and sportsmen killed thousands of animals for the sheer joy of killing, not even bothering to carry home the carcasses.

Finally thinking people began to realize that if unrestricted trapping and hunting continued there would soon be no fur bearers to take. Conservation commissions were formed in many states. The fur industry gave advice, and even the government took an active part. One by one nearly all the states have passed laws limiting the season during which fur animals may be trapped to the cold winter months when furs are most valuable, and thus insuring the future fur supply. Trappers themselves have been quick to appreciate the advantages of intelligent conservation; and the higher prices they secure for prime furs is more than making up for the fact that they can no longer trap during the unprime season.
Conservation means more, however, than the legislative control of trapping seasons. Trappers are also learning how by more careful skinning, stretching, and drying they can make the furs they do catch yield them a maximum of returns. For instance the First National Fur show offering $5,000 in cash awards for well handled furs is now being sponsored by the Sears, Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. The purpose of the show is two fold. It encourages better preparation of pelts for market and discourages the taking of furs out of season. Movements such as this are constantly bringing the benefits of conservation before the eyes of trappers, and it is hoped that some day the slogan "Every trapper his own game warden" will be a reality.

You could park on an Iceberg

YOU COULD—but of course you won't have to. But we'll leave it to you—if Sterling WINTER-GRADE Gasoline or Ethyl will step right out after the car has set in a cold garage all night—do we need to put up any more proof that it is the correct fuel for cold weather?

And don't forget that Sterling Motor Oil does not run off the cylinder walls when the engine is idle. It adheres. This means protection when the motor is cold and everything is stiff.
