—WEEKLY HEALTH TALK—

"Last evening two friends were discussing plans for the summer vacation. One of the men intends to take a two thousand mile automobile trip; the other one expects to do the same thing except at 12 o'clock noon, with twenty-five hundred miles both journeys however to be completed in ten days. Thus they are typical of thousands of recreationists who plan more for the thrill than for the reconstructive possibilities of a summer's outing," said Doctor Theodore B. Appel, Secretary of Health.

"It so happens that each of the referred to gentlemen as already arranged for his children to enter a summer camp. And in this connection one of them most truthfully remarked, 'You see, the back-to-nature life, the rest and discipline connected with an organized camp will develop a fine degree of vitality and vigor in the youngsters and will consequently generate a fine physical resistance for their next winter's work.'

"Strangely enough, this perfectly logical solicitation for the welfare of offspring is frequently considered to be quite unnecessary for the parents themselves. But the point is that oftentimes they are in need of health-giving and vitality-building rest quite as much as are the children, and in some instances, even more so.

"Therefore, while there is no desire to minimize the pleasure to be obtained by rolling along through strange country at a stiff clip of two hundred miles a day for ten days, or to deny the excitement of the more or less hectic man-made diversions at summer resorts, it should be clearly understood that less attention to such alluring pursuits and the display of more interest for nature's real demands would result in greater and more lasting dividends from the annual sojourn than is now the case for many hundreds of thousands.

"People should realize that fresh air, quiet rest, wholesome food and regulated hours will accomplish in terms of health and happiness quite as much for them as for the young people. Therefore, it is suggested that in planning for this year's pleasure careful consideration be given as well as to the thrill factor of the vacation.

"A few less miles at break-neck speed, or the development of a wholesome resistance to exotic entertainment, late hours and excesses at summer resorts, and more affection for the life-giving possibilities of nature will give the body a real boost in terms of joy and health and vitality. Why not plan along these lines this summer?"
