CHAPTER XIII—Continued

She looked through everything and found material with the dust of a year upon it. In a pile were pictures of the poplar tree. He had made the tree again and again. She caught a hint of desperation. He had been deliberately careless. He had distorted the limbs, but neither the carelessness nor the distortion had given him the quality that lay now on the board with the charcoal sketch of herself on the stairs-a thing called Life. Vitality! Months of work. Months of struggle. Secret, Ment—a new idea, a new stirring paia goading him out of his path.

And every morning he had to go and make the cat cartoons. He had to go from the Sun to the movie studio. When he was longing to experiment with this new conception. He was ready to leave satire for a new form of beauty. He was ready to establish a new and modern school of work.

It was not an unnatural development. Looking back, it seemed to Ernestine that the years had conspired in order to accomplish this. She remembered the little boy with his leg in a brace, who had made the book of bird pictures for her-a book she still loved and possessed, and which she had been showing to Peter only a day or two ago. Will had so loved the color of wings.

She recalled the water colors on his mother's walls: the smudged pictures of John Pryor when he was a babycrude but warm. She remembered what Mrs. Todd had said-all the neighbors thought Will would be a great artist some day. If he were not subjugated to her biological necessities!

Through the newspaper environment and his hero worship of John Poole he had become a cartoonist. And he had had hard work and desperate struggle to accomplish that. But the very things this success had brought him had been a means of releasing this deeper, more sincere impulse. The comfort, the affluence, the sense of security, all had enabled him to begin to give heed to another voice.

And Will had thought in his simplicity that he could have a secret! He had imagined that he could, in his idle hours, pursue this new and delightful gift of artistry. He had experimented here alone with new tools, new methods, and thought that no one would ever know. Ernestine was wiser. She knew the consequences of activity, secret or open. This studio was going to destroy the cats as cer-

"Whenever you are ready, Will, I will be ready, too."

But Will did not seem to be ready. He had changed. He had become stent, morose, irritable. There was no question now as to where he was speeding his time, for he played bridge three times, but could not get Lillian's hours every day. He won constantly, house nor Loring's office.

Effectine kept him as clean of money "Funny thing Lillian's n could lay hands on to her own purposes. She did not know how much money he won at cards, but his mania was a new thing, and she could not in the club to which he belonged she saw him through the open door of the cardroom, sitting at a heavy round table, his face absolutely set, his dark eyes watchful, playing in an intense

"How does he play?" she asked her partner, a friend of Will. "I've played with him, of course, but always with women, and he seemed indifferent-caresess." "I wish I could get him at a table when there were women there," the man, a middle-aged illustrator, answered. "He has a great deal of my oney. Why, he plays an extraordipart'y good game, and every one likes to pay with him because he minds his own business. He plays for study, but he Goesn't row. He makes no mistakes, but he doesn't jump on the fellow who does. And cards! Oh, boy-he has them. He has an abso-lutery marvelous memory."

Renestine knew this. Will's memory was part of his equipment as an artist, He would be able to visualize each trick that had fallen, without error, she knew. But she was troubled. She and arstood the psychological use of the word "substitution," and it occurred to her in connection with Will et the bridge tables, but she could not get the thing clearly. Will was drugins himself with the mechanical occupaton of cards. The cards interested, absarbed, fascinated him. The mesmer'c fascination of the game were useful to him as a means of stilling something-she could not quite get it. She could not ask him whether he had ceared going to the little office. She felt balked and wounded.

Her fear gave her sudden fury. "Am I to account to you for every penny?" she exclaimed. "I did without, long enough. Now that you're earning, are you going to be niggardly with me? Don't you dare ask me what I do with my money!"

He made no answer, his face bored and scornful. She had been thinking that when he came in she would try to talk to him, but now the moment was passed. He undressed and got into bed, and said in his quick irritable way:

"Either turn out the light or go somewhere else. I'm tired." "From working?" she asked, and then regretted swiftly. That was too much like that other time-that other

Will did not answer, but turned his back and flung his arm, in the blue pajama sleeve, up over his eyes. Ernestine put out the lights except the small lamp at her side of the bed, and sat on the bed for a while, her feet drawn up and her arms clasped around her knees, thinking, her mind turning this way and that, her heart full of pain.

"Will?" she said at last gently, but he did not answer. She went around and stood beside him, looking down at him. He was asleep. His eyes and brow were hidden by the fold of his arm, but his wide mouth, his mobile, sensitive, excited mouth was in repose. Where had she seen that droop before? It was Elaine's. It was the gentle enduring fold of her mouth, when she had been little and sick so much, and had borne it all with such remarkable patience. Will's mouth was like that. Not in cut or form, but in the line of its expression. Will was bearing something. He was sick. He was enduring. Ernestine felt herself lost in a dark wood. Fiercely, passionately, she buried in herself her personal resentment and pain. She must find a way out for all of them. If she could see what to do! If something would show her the way! Next morning Will ate his breakfast and went out, his manner more normal that it had been of late. He kissed her cheek, and said to her: "Was I rough last night, kitten?

You're pale. Sorry. I left the money in your desk drawer. Use it. It's all for you and the children, anyhow." "Thanks, Will," she said indifferently, for now she did not care about the money at all. "Do you know anything about Loring and fillian? We've not seen them for days. I've been spring housecleaning, and haven't even phoned her. I tried to get her just now, and no one answered."

"I think Loring and Pastano are having some trouble," said Will. "I saw Ruby a day or two ago, and he was black in the face about something Loring tried to put over on him. He'll be hard, if he gets turned against your brother-in-law. I'll call Loring at his office today, and see if I can find out what's up. Well, so long. I'm late."

Ernestine was busy with her family and household all morning, but with a sense of troubled foreboding in her heart. She went to the phone two or

"Funny thing Lillian's maid isn't at home," she thought, but no one answered the prolonged ring at the other house. Ernestine went on about her work, and at eleven o'clock, Molly called her to the phone.

Ruby Pastano was standing by the green-curtained windows, looking down into the street through a tiny slit he known to those in the house, who held open with his finger. He turned called the police.
