ROOSEVELT DEPRESSION" or MONOPOLY DEPRESSION

Here is an excerpt from the article on CORPORALS OF INDUSTRY, by E. D. Ennedy, printed in the book, "America Now," by Harold E. Stearns, which ought to be read by every intelligent person in the country:

"The monopolistic nature of companies like Anaconda Copper, United States Steel, General Motors, Owens Illinois, United States Shoe Machinery, General Electric and many another, should be clearly recognized. These companies are the result of great accumulations of capital. In good times they overproduce to make high profits and in bad times they underemploy to preserve profits which are still very considerable and which smaller and more competitive companies cannot register at any time. They are exactly like the railroads, the light and power companies, and the utilities, and like these so-called 'natural' monopolies they should submit to regulation.

That regulation might take the form of limitation of income in the shape of maximum prices—just as railroad and other utility prices (rates) are regulated in the general good. More effective, however, because less deflationary, would be a stiffly graduated income tax with the rates on corporate profits applied on the same basis as has been long established with rates on personal incomes. The growth of some of our mammoth companies would undoubtedly be somewhat checked, but it is precisely their excessive growth that has made our corporate (let alone our social) structure such a lopsided and one-sided affair.

Meanwhile, the spokesmen of the monopolists have adopted the technique of identifying big business with all business—of pretending that anything which might damage the Aluminum Company, or the present Standard of New Jersey is just as damaging to the neighborhood butcher or the corner druggist. They call upon economic principles which they themselves have made no longer applicable. They appeal to an industrial way of life which began to weaken in 1890 and which was almost entirely destroyed by 1929. They ignore the fact that they were completely in the saddle during the days of Harding, Coolidge, and the first year of Hoover. They forget that they were still 'unregulated' during the last three years of the Hoover administration but did nothing but watch depression deepen into disaster and then look for a cyclone cellar. They also do not remember that they were glad to have Mr. Roosevelt close the banks and establish the NRA; and that their hostility to the New Deal dates from the time when Mr. Roosevelt's money-spending restored consuming power enough to give them a large measure of restored profits—which they refused to share, however meagerly, with the unemployed whom they had themselves created. Today they are ranting about 'dictatorship,' and they are trying to label as the "Roosevelt Depression" a period of acute crisis caused largely by their overproducing and overpricing last winter and last spring. Left to their own devices—which include the election neither of a Republican or a reactionary Democrat, like Garner, as our next President—and they will produce a condition of chronic depression with all the attributes (particularly mass unemployment) which killed the German Republic even before Mr. Hitler started doing business on the corpse.

And they will try to do all these things by appealing to the medium sized and small business man as if they were his brothers instead of his oppressors. They will pose as the defenders of American democracy; they will call upon the good old days when American business men went out to build up the country in the process of building up himself.

There is a case to be made out for monopoly, provided it is regulated monopoly. But at least let us not mistake the monopolist for a poor boy trying to get along. In 1929—when the most corporations paid the most dividends to the most people, about 18,000 people got about $2,000,000,000 and less than 40,000 people got over $2,500,000,000, which was over 40 per cent of all the dividends declared. A very small group of very large investors own American industry—no matter how many insignificant stockholders may appear on the corporate books. There are somewhere around 360,000 stockholders in General Motors, but one stockholder—E. I. duPont de Nemours—owns more than 20 per cent of its 43,000,000 shares of common. In 1931 the late Andrew Mellon submitted evidence in an income tax evasion case that he and his immediate family had title to one and a third million shares of Gulf Oil, out of 4,500,000 shares outstanding. The big corporation of today is not the product of a big man, it is the product of big money. Capital, not management, determines the important decisions of business today.

From a social standpoint, the oldtimers did not amount to very much. But with all their imperfections, they frequently did start from the bottom, they did get to the top, and however unintentionally, they improved the general standard of living while they were on the way up. But do not confuse the captains of industry of yesterday with the corporals of industry today. The modern corporation executive is interested only in cutting every cost except his own—usually exorbitant—salary. He is not an owner. He is a hired man. The people who appear in the top brackets of our personal income tax returns derive sometimes as high as 85 per cent of their incomes from corporate dividends, and from dividends which, during the last ten years, less than one per cent of the American corporations have been consistently able to declare.

When it comes to a choice between protecting these dividends—not from elimination, but from reduction—and impoverishing the rest of the country, these people do not hesitate. Neither do the corporate presidents whom they have hired for the job.

PATTON METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

James A. Turner, pastor. Church school at 9 a. m. Preaching at 10 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. Mid-week Bible class on Wednesday evening at 7:30.

It is said that Queen Victoria once presented herself before the keeper of the treasure chamber in Windsor castle with a request for the richer of the two small caskets in his custody, each made of solid crystal, exquisite in workmanship and very costly. Selecting the richer and finer of the two, she drew from her pocket a copy of the Bible, and locked it in the casket, which was then returned to its place, richer than ever for the new treasure it contained. The Bible stored in that shrine was General Gordon's. It had been his daily support and solace, and was with him at Khartoum. It was worn and marked with the thousand notes of daily use and daily study, which indicated the relation of his hero owner to it and what it had been to him. It was not a new copy of Scripture, fresh, unsoiled, and unused, that was thus royally set; it was not selected for the beauty of the binding, the richness of the material, or the excellence of the workmanship. I was chosen because it had once borne the relation it did to a heroic life. It had helped to create that life, to raise it high, to make it pure and strong, to fill it with faith and light and hope.

Happy is the person who has hidden the Word in the jeweled casket of his heart, so that when the hard times come and the stresses and trials of life bear down upon the soul, there is a source for the solace, comfort, strength and encouragement that are then needed.
