DOG SAVES OWNER AND TWO OTHERS IN ICY BLIZZARD

'Lady,' Once Just a 'Bag of Bones,' Finds Shelter For Dying Men.

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA.—Alaska has a new heroine. She's not much to look at, this eight year old husky called Lady; a snarling, tough old bit of dogflesh worth $5 as an investment. But three hardened sourdoughs are mighty grateful to her. She saved them all from death in the cutting blizzard that recently swept the bleak Kaiyuh mountains.

The story was told recently by Frank Alba, who is recovering from a broken leg in St. Joseph's hospital here. He was prospecting in the mountains when he suffered the injury. His partner, Kenneth Oxford, and a neighbor, Frank Spieljack, bound him on a sled. They made up a team of eight dogs, with Lady in the lead, and set out for the nearest settlement, Kaltag.

Blizzard Sweeps Down. That was on a Monday. The next day the blizzard swept down on them. They all mushed on and for three days the blizzard raged. Dog food ran out and the sourdoughs gave their bacon to the dogs.

"At 10 o'clock Oxford said he could not travel on. The snowshoes had blistered his feet. He sought shelter and told us to send help in the morning," Alba continued. "Spieljack kept the dogs headed against the storm until midnight. He and the dogs were so tired he lay down. He had no covering; his outer garment was just a parka made of drill. He told me if he hadn't had me to care for he'd just have lain there until he froze.

"The blizzard was raging when I called him. We decided to go back to a vacant woodcutter's tent. "The night was pitch dark. I couldn't even see Lady at the head of the team. But she was out there, breaking her own trail. "Finally she stopped. I thought she was done. But beside the sled there was a figure. It was Oxford, who had attempted to overtake us. If we hadn't turned back, and if Lady hadn't found him, he'd have died.

"Oxford took hold of the sled G-pole and staggered along. We went on downstream. After a while Lady turned away from the river, toward the bank. Spieljack headed her back. She swerved again and almost trotted until she'd pulled us up to the bank. Then she lay down. I said, maybe she'd sensed a tent was near. "Spieljack found the vacant tent, with a Yukon stove and some cut wood, close by. They pushed me and the sled inside, built a fire and while I suffered tortures with my leg, the men and dogs slept like logs.

"At daybreak Spieljack took the dogs on an 11-mile mush to Kaltag for help. About three we heard voices and dogs barking. Four teams had come for us. "We never could have survived if Lady hadn't had such stamina—and brains," Alba concluded. "She kept that team going during the blizzards; she found Oxford, and she found that tent."

Tells Police Judge, 'So Long, I'll Be Seeing You'

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—After getting drunk on money that Police Judge Joseph N. Ackerman had given him to buy tobacco, 71-year-old James Cleary swaggered into the judge's court and begged for "one more chance." "I saved the money you sent me at the workhouse," Cleary said, "but when I got out I felt I had to celebrate." Judge Ackerman gave him a suspended sentence. Cleary bustled happily out of the courtroom, waved good-bye. "So long, Joe," he said, "I'll be seeing you."

DUSTY COAL ASHES ROUGH WEALTH TO SCIENTIST JOHNSON

Pittsburgh.—Coal ashes may be just a dusty nuisance to some people but they're rough wealth to scientist R. C. Johnson.

He says they can be transformed into building materials, insulating blocks, soil-less gardens and abrasive for mechanic's soap.

Synthetic stone made from anthracite ash, lime and water, and a tomato crop nearly one-third heavier than normal are displayed in Dr. Johnson's laboratory as proof of the worth of this waste material produced at the rate of 6,000,000 a year in five eastern states alone.

"In our process, developed after extensive tests at Mellon Institute, the coal ash is mixed with ten per cent lime and the necessary amount of water," explained Dr. Johnson. "This is formed into the desired architectural shapes under a pressure of several thousand pounds a square inch.

"The shapes are then cured under moderate steam pressure for several hours. During this process there is a chemical reaction between the lime and the anthracite ash which transforms the article into a stone hard mass of calcium aluminum silicate."

Using the same coal ashes, the scientist raised a master crop of tomatoes in a greenhouse on the eighth floor of the institute's new building. He also found that, mixed with soap, properly prepared coal ash would grind off the crease from any mechanic's hands.

Dr. Johnson said ashes could be moulded into first class insulators for use in air conditioning or sound proofing while householders could use anthracite coal ashes upon lawns and gardens as a means of lightening the texture of heavy soils.
