LABORATORY PROVES THAT "WORM" IS NOT A WORM

Harrisburg.—Experts at the Summerdale laboratory of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the State Department of Agriculture recently were required to show that a "worm" is not a worm.

According to Dr. C. P. Bishop, director of the Bureau of Animal Industry, the belief that rabies in dogs is caused by a worm in the tongue of the dog, has prevailed in many parts of the world.

Evidence that this belief exists in Pennsylvania, Dr. Bishop said, was afforded by a dog's head recently sent by a Pennsylvanian to the laboratory. The sender declared that the dog had rabies because he "had cut the rabies worm out of the tongue of the dog." The so-called worm, wrapped in wax paper was attached to the tongue of the dog. The experts found that the "worm" was a band of fibrous tissue normally found in the tongues of all dogs.

BIRDS REPURCHASED FOR RESTOCKING IN SPRING

The State game commission stated this week that contracts have been accepted to purchase a total of 11,251 full grown ringneck pheasants for restocking throughout the commonwealth in March, 1940, to add to the birds held on its own game farms. These birds were purchased from private game breeders within the commonwealth, the first year Pennsylvania breeders needs.

The Commission also entered into contract to purchase 1,570 Pennsylvania produced Bobwhite quail, the entire number offered by Pennsylvania breeders, and 3,500 Bobwhite quail were contracted for by breeders outside the state. Of the total number of quail contracted for, approximately 800 to 1,000 will be used for breeding stock on the state farms, and the balance will be liberated in April.

LOOKING AHEAD

By Len De Caux.

When John L. Lewis registers his objection to anyone trying to dispose of labor politically without consulting labor, it usually causes the same kind of excitement as Gulliver once caused in Lilliputia, according to a previously unrecorded version of the famous tale.

The tiny men discovered Gulliver sleeping, it will be recalled. There was much dispute as to what to do with their giant find, in all of which needless to say, Gulliver was not consulted. And finally the Lilliputians improvised a platform, to which they tied Gulliver and thus transported him prostrate to their city.

The press of Lilliputia was full of the event. The administration of the day pointed with pride to its handling of the situation. It declared itself to be Gulliver's best friend, at the same time assuring anti-Gulliver elements that it would stand for no nonsense if he did not behave. Gulliver should be well satisfied with the platform provided for him, it felt, even if he might be a bit roughly handled at times over some of the bumps.

The opposition, on the other hand, accused the administration of entering into a conspiracy with the "monster" and allowing him too much freedom. It veiled with alarm all the possible and impossible horrors it could imagine.

The Garnercrats of Lilliputia were so impressed with arguments of the opposition that they joined it in a conspiracy of their own. They climbed all over Gulliver, tying knots in his bonds and set up committees to spit in his eye.

There was amazement if not consternation, however, when Gulliver began to awaken to stir about and to find his voice.

Each movement and utterance of his caused widespread speculation. The liberals asked why he couldn't lie still and quiet, and warned him not to turn against his friends. The Tories said he might destroy civilization unless squelched. The cynics attributed his moves to all sorts of motives and political machinations. The dopesters made varying predictions as to the effects on next elections.

But all that Gulliver was trying to get across was that, much as he appreciated the solicitude of his friends and was aware of the plans of his enemies, he did not intend to be treated indefinitely like a load of freight.

He gave fair warning to all alike that he intended to get up and proceed under his own power; that he, after all, had the most intimate concern in the plans being made for him; and that he expected to be fully consulted in their preparation if he was to cooperate in their execution.

All of which, though essentially reasonable and simple to human beings of normal stature, was shocking and inexplicable to Lilliputians who had thought of Gulliver as something to be disposed of, not somebody with proposals and plans of his own.

Until the CIO came along to organize the unorganized, American labor was traditionally treated by the Lilliputians.

Industrialists, philanthropists and politicians would quarrel over the inert body of unorganized labor, each proclaiming that they knew what was best for it. Some would favor kind and liberal treatment, others harsh suppression, some advise increasing labor's rations and freedom, others restricting them.

And when elections came along labor would even be offered alternative menus by rival political caterers. Labor could nod its head or shake it when offered such a choice. But it was never allowed any real participation in preparing the bill of fare.

But with CIO organization there has come a political awakening on the part of American labor. Through the CIO and Labor's Non-Partisan League labor has begun to make demands of its own which astound old time politicians.

They do not yet seem to have grasped the full significance of this new attitude on the part of progressive organized labor.

Each one of the major political utterances of John L. Lewis, leader and spokesman of the new labor movement, has stirred all sorts of speculation and the most widely varying motives have been ascribed to him.

Yet, through all these statements, in the plainest possible English for those who have ears to hear or eyes to read, there runs one very reasonable and simple idea.

It is that labor is the master of its own destiny; that it is not a political commodity to be bartered about, but a free and equal participant in American democracy; that it has plans of its own and that it demands the right to participate in the drafting of any program or the choice of any candidates it is expected to support.
