Disposing of Crop Remnants Now Is Solution for Ridding Gardens of Summer Pests

The time to check next summer's pests is right now, the State Department of Agriculture advises, when the farmer is apt to relax his vigilance against the crop-consuming insects.

"An important job is promptly to dispose of remnants of crops in the garden," said the department bulletin, "as they are sources through which many of the pests are brought to maturity the following season to begin their work of destruction."

escape to hibernating quarters prevented," said the bulletin. Remnants of the squash crop should be buried or raked on a pile and then burned, destroying many of the squash bugs and preventing their development to feed upon next year's crop.

The same goes in orchards, where insects are seeking protected places at this season to spend the winter. The codling moth worms leave the wormy apples, or have left them, to enter dead and cracked limbs, under rough bark and into odd litter about the orchard.

Grain crops should be planted after the free date for the Hessian fly.
