HARD WINTER TAKES TOLL OF ALL FORMS OF WILD LIFE

The sportsmen who have been concerned about an antlerless deer season next year need have no fears on that score if present weather conditions prevail for about two weeks more in the deer country.

Deer have given up trying to get food in the wooded areas and are fighting their way through crusted snow drifts to the farms and main highways, where they have been observed for the past week.

Most of them are in the last stages of starvation and the cold has so weakened them, that it will be impossible for them to survive much longer.

Many of the sportsmen's groups have made arrangements to feed as many of the deer and other wild life as possible, but it is a larger task than they can handle alone. Despite all their efforts the deer of Pennsylvania will be reduced to almost the point of extermination unless something happens very quickly.

Not only are the deer suffering, but all forms of wild life are in the same tragic stage.

The situation is so serious that sportsmen's groups are planning to make feeding trips to the mountainous country in an effort to save as many birds and animals as possible.
