STATE OFFERS THE WOUNDED VETS A FREE EDUCATION

Pennsylvania is making it possible for wounded war veterans in military hospitals to continue their education without cost to themselves. William H. Chestnut, secretary of labor and industry, announced during the week.

"Through the facilities of the State Bureau of Rehabilitation, Pennsylvania proposes to help the wounded veterans to start back to school as soon as they are able to attend classes," Chestnut said.

"Many wounds of these men require long and involved treatment and it is conceivable that a veteran could spend several years in a hospital for this treatment. If his plans call for continuing his education, it is obvious that his hospital experiences would be virtually lost time."

Two requirements must be met by a veteran, he said, before the state can send him to college or a university. He must be a state resident of at least one year's standing, even though that year might be spent as a patient in a military hospital; and he must be able physically to attend classes, to meet regulations of the particular institution he plans to attend.

"A number of veterans have met the requirements of both the Bureau of Rehabilitation and a college or university within commuing range of their hospitals," Mr. Chestnut added. "Unnecessary delay and loss of valuable time has been avoided."

Operations of the bureau, whose program is designed to help handicapped citizens of the commonwealth is financed jointly by federal and state funds.

The bureau reported the program will affect veterans in the Valley Forge Army Hospital and the Philadelphia Naval Hospital immediately.
