YOUR Health

There are many laws governing the practice of medicine in Pennsylvania. Physicians are familiar with the majority of them as the conduct of their practice is prescribed and regulated by these laws.

In order to bring physicians up to date in such matters, the Pennsylvania Medical Journal, official organ of the Medical Society of Pennsylvania, recently published a legalistic section.

The Pennsylvania statutes related to the practice of health and trends of health in a community. The first phase of the Section discussed vital statistics, which have been called the "bookkeeping records of humanity."

All states have laws conforming with the Uniform Vital Statistics Act recommended by the U. S. Bureau of Censura.

Vital statistics include "the registration, preparation, transcription, collection, compilation, and preservation of data pertaining to births, adoptions, legitimations, deaths, stillbirths, marital status and data incidental thereto."

Many certificates for various purposes must be signed by a physician, but those for which he is directly responsible deal with the beginning and end of life—birth and death.
