Wally Westlake Making Good With Buc Team

Waldon T. Westlake, outfielder for the Pittsburgh Pirates, started his professional ball career in 1940. He was one of the best hurriers to show up in the Pirate's training camp this spring.

The 6-foot-184-pound thrower, is a righthanded hitter and pitcher, and hitter and pitcher are the right words. He is a solid soccer, not unlike the Honus Wagner of old in build, even to the bowed legs.

During the first two years, the native Californian's name appeared on the rosters of Elmira in the Eastern League, Dayton of the Middle Atlantic League, and Merced, Calif., of the California League. Oakland of the Pacific League gained title to him in '44, but before he could get a chance with them he went to the service.

Rejoining the Oaks last year, he ranked 4th in the loop in hitting averages, with a robust mark of .315 for 136 games, scored 80 runs and made 135 hits, among which were 19 doubles, 5 triples and 7 home runs. The runs he knocked in totaled 57, as against 66 strikeouts, and hit 30 bases on balls and was hit by pitcher 11 times.

In the field, Westlake accepted 258 putouts and 17 assists while committing 9 errors, for a fielding average of .968.

Last year, in particular, he showed so much promise that Pittsburgh stepped right in and bought him from Oakland as one of the first moves of the new owners.

Mules Would Rather Die Than Retire

This is the sad tale of two "coal miners" who died in the harness rather than leave the mine they loved.

William Nelson, foreman at No. 1 Mine of the Patton Clay Manufacturing Co., Patton, tells the tale of two mules employed at the mine for years to haul coal and clay from the underground workings. When the mine was modernized and mechanized recently the four mules at the mine were scheduled to be "retired" to life on a farm.

However, only two were given to the farm, because two of the mules "died in the harness" at the mine shortly before the modern locomotive replaced them as coal haulers.
