Crime Rate Low In Pennsylvania, Says Parole Head

The crime rate in Pennsylvania is surprisingly low, according to Maj. Henry C. Hill, chairman of the State Board of Parole.

In fact, he says, the State occupies a relatively proud position in a tabulation of crime statistics for the nation.

The tabulation is all the more surprising, he pointed out, considering the number of congested, metropolitan areas in the Middle Atlantic States—Pennsylvania, New York and New Jersey.

His analysis was based on "uniform crime reports" issued by the FBI for the first half of the year 1947.

With the exception of commercialized vice, the Middle Atlantic states ranked lowest in sex offenses. This area also was at the bottom of the list in crimes of forgery, counterfeiting, drunken driving and motor violations.

It was next to low in prosecutions for murder and voluntary manslaughter and for liquor law violations, and third from the bottom of the list in crimes of forger, counterfeiting, drunken driving and motor violations.

The Middle Atlantic group stood at the middle of the list in burglary prosecutions.

In all other offenses, grouped together, they were lowest.

"A law abiding citizenry, the very efficient Pennsylvania State Police and other organized law enforcement agencies can look with pride on this report," Maj. Hill asserts.
