Mining Engineers Have Important Place In Industry, Says Pfister

Hastings Man Began Surveys 47 Years Ago

"Among the many branches of technical services by skilled men, which are necessary to form an efficient organization to operate a modern coal mine, there is one branch of the personnel that does not, as a rule, receive much notice. And that is the mining engineer."

He went on to say that the engineer guides the miners in driving headings, air courses so that proper pillars may be maintained for safety of men, guide the most past old workings filled with water and very dangerous.

Mr. Pfister began work at the age of 23 with the Pennsylvania Coal & Coke Corp. engineering corps. Later he was associated with H. J. Hinterlightner and Charles E. Schlicher of Spangler. He began his present duties as head of the Blubaker Coal Co. field office in Spangler on May 1, 1917. He also practices general engineering.
