Now that coast-to-coast television is a reality the story of some of the elaborate means provided to guard against failure in transmission can be told. With the necessity for crossing alternate stretches of high mountain land and desert a most rugged set of conditions prevail. To meet these microwave radio-relay, a recent advance in the science of communications, is used for transmission. This relay system has been set up by the Long Lines Department of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

Illustrated here is a typical relay station with its emergency standby equipment on Buckhorn Mountain located 63 miles northwest of Denver, Colorado. The engine shown is a two-cylinder GM Diesel generator set made by Detroit Diesel Engine Division of General Motors Corporation. It can supply AC power in a matter of seconds should the high-line power ever fail or should high-line voltage fall even 10 per cent below normal.

The unit starts and continues to operate whether it is attended or not. It will start immediately at temperatures as low as 20 degrees Fahrenheit because a jacket water heater keeps the water temperature at a nominal 90 degrees Fahrenheit. The starting motor operates from a 32-volt battery instead of 6 or 12 volts as used on cars and trucks. Every technical safeguard surrounds this standby system to maintain the highest possible standard of accurate picture and sound transmission.
