Don't Waste Venison Or Trophy; Proper 'Hog Dressing' Described

Editor's Note: The following is a bit late for this "hunt" season but still in time for next week's "doe" season. Deer hunters would do well to clip it and put it in with their hunting license on the back of their coat so they have it handy if and when needed.

Last year, "shirt-sleeve" weather and inexperience in dressing out and transporting kills were responsible for the loss of much venison and many deer heads in Pennsylvania.

Henry P. Davis, editor of the Remington News Letter, recently made the following excellent recommendations to successful deer hunters to prevent spoiling of deer meat or trophies. Said Davis:

"No hunt is wholly successful if the sportsman allows the game meat to spoil or his trophy to be ruined through neglect. . . . Much excellent venison is wasted each season because the hunter does not exercise proper caution in dressing the animal out and seeing that the meat is completely cooled as soon as possible.

"As soon as the animal is killed the hunter should tag it. Do not destroy evidence of sex. Turn the animal's head downhill so that it will bleed freely. It is quite important to cool the deer as rapidly as possible in order to keep the meat fresh and sweet. This can best be done by 'hog-dressing' it as quickly as you can. . . .

"Cut the carcass open from crotch to throat. Be extremely careful not to puncture the intestines or bladder. . . . Cut around the vent and loosen the organs in the pelvic cavity, taking care to keep hair from coming in contact with the meat. Now turn the carcass so that the head is downhill. Cut windpipe and gullet free at the throat. Pull backwards on these, cutting free from the body any part that sticks. Now remove all internal organs. Open the cavity and spread it apart with a stick. Wipe it dry with a clean cloth. Do not wash it out with water. . . .

"If you are taking the carcass out of the woods before cooling and quartering, leave the heart and liver in the body cavity. . . . Spread it so that air can circulate freely. Black sugar will aid in keeping flies away. If practical allow it to cool overnight.

"Deer meat is not 'tough' if it has been properly stored. Aging at the proper temperature is necessary in tenderizing any meat. Most hunters recommend that deer meat be aged for about one week at a temperature of from 37° to 40°. This aging time depends on how old the deer may be; a real old buck should be aged for about 30 days. If you properly cool, age and freeze your venison, it can be cooked in such a delicious manner that it will taste better than any 'store bought' meat obtainable.

If you plan to put it in cold storage, it would be well to give it a 'quick freeze' first. Deer meat which is frozen should be cut into proper sized cuts and carefully wrapped with foil or waxed paper in air-tight packages."

Wild Waterfowl Season To Include Next Week

The State Game Commission this week announced the extension of the open hunting season for certain species of wild waterfowl on a statewide basis.

The season was to have ended Saturday, Dec. 13. The extension will compensate for days closed to hunting due to the dryness of the woods.

The special extended season for ducks, geese, American and red-breasted mergansers and coots will include Monday thru Friday of next week, Dec. 15 through 19. Bag limits, shooting hours and other regulations previously announced apply to the special extended period.
