Lip-Reading Brings Happiness to Many Handicapped Folks

In the days of the silent movies actors were warned to watch their words. As action, not sound, was being recorded on film, overswrought actors made snide remarks now and again and lip-readers in the audience "heard" them.

Lip-reading is one contact deaf persons have with communication. In progressing cases of deafness lip-reading should be learned before the hearing is too much impaired.

When parental speech accompanies activities and describes the objects and actions in the environment, the child will in time associate the facial movements he sees with the actions or objects of the moment.
