A freight train bound north was expected to arrive at any moment, and the engine was to help the regular up the grade to the top of the mountain. Patrick Dugan, the engineer, had gone to the telegraph office gineer, had gone to the telegraph office nearby for orders, leaving in the cab the fireman, John Lenox, a new man. The brakemen, Ed. Fox and Art, Dot-ter, were standing together near the cab door and in front of the fire hole talking.

door and in front of the fire hole talking.
Dugan spent some time in the telegraph office receiving his orders, and finally turned from the door of the office to go back to his engine. As he did so the boiler exploded, hurling the engine from the track, splitting the heavy tender in half and shattering the cab and the levers into a mass of debris, while the unfortunate men were hurled amid masses of iron in all directions.

Engineer Dugan says the engine was
