THE WOMAN OF FASHION.

Many Pretty Gowns for the Gay Easter Promenade.

How Fair Woman Will Bedeck Herself if the Day Be Bright—Pleasure in All Its Ways—Wardrobe—Gay and Festive Gowns.

Copyright, 1891.
The Easter pageant this year will lack something of its old careless magnificence. If the sun shines, there will be light, brilliance, richness of color, as of old; but the close observer will easily discover signs of care, of discrimination, that the Easter costume rarely displays. We have truly taken no thought for the future in getting ready for that grayest promenade of all the year. Not one whit cared we whether our gown would be useful for future days and occasions. So long as Fifth avenue opened her arms to us, and pronounced us fit to mingle with her Easter throng, we were satisfied. But, alack and alas! other considerations have weighed heavily upon us these early spring days. We dare not turn our eyes utterly from that stern Dame Economy, who demands that extravagance be curtailed, and more sensible modes adopted. So that the greatest charm of the American girl—her daring and richness in robing—will not impress us so vividly as of old. Think not, however, that because of this no interest will be awakened in the crowd that pours forth from fashionable churches at high noon of the Sabbath, March 25. Our modes are altogether too taking for that, modifications and all. The Easter gown will show these main characteristics. Skirts, gracefully godeted, and, for the most part, plain. A little lace may be seen, caught up in cascades, or a full satin fold, or three plain satin folds or bands. The bodices, those that are not tailor made, will have full gathered fronts. The fronts will be brightened by insertions of ribbon or lace set in; or there will be lace yokes, with full fronts beneath; or coat effects, with lovely lace effects between, or short Figaro effects with lace. There will be a rever somewhere, or a shoulder ruffle in godets; you may count upon that. There will be scarcely a costume that does not show one or more hip ruffles, small or large; and all of these combinations will be lightened and gladdened by the touch of each woman's individuality, and unexpected blendings and changes will transform the styles the fashion writer is weary in describing, and reveal to her possibilities that she and her dressmaker friend never dreamed of. I have not been idle these Lenten days. Are you anxious to know what just a few of those dresses will be? A girl with the darkest hair and whitest skin in the world has just folded her gray Easter gown neatly away in a great box. When she took it out tenderly to show me I saw that there was a tiny bit of an underskirt in shining pale gray mohair, only three inches of which were visible under the skirt of fine gray serge that fell over. The skirts were both severely plain. The corsage was a short Figaro, fitting closely in at the waist line and turning back in broad revers that continued themselves into godets over the shoulders. A pretty chemise was made of gathered white bengaline, and a graceful Robespierre bow was tied over. The revers were faced with white bengaline and had a tiny edge of gold passementerie all around. The sleeves had moderately large puffs at the elbow and gathered cuffs of bengaline. Two rows of large pearl buttons fastened the Figaro together. It was a striking costume and particularly simple.

Another brunette friend of mine had picked a lovely green from out of the shining spring stuffs. She had caught the godets of the skirt up into a big bunch at the left hip and held them there with a buckle. She had started a broad band of white moire at the bottom of her skirt, right in the center of the front, and drawn it, diagonally, around this self-same garment. She had set a graceful bow of white, in narrower ribbon, on the left shoulder, where it fell in long ends. Thence, across the front of the bodice, was a draping of the broader moire, caught up under the right arm; and a crushed white belt, in narrow folds, encircled the waist. White gloves will be worn with the costume.

But I saw another one; and immediately succumbed to its charms. The material was a delicate old blue, dashed with white sifs, so that a silvery sheen was the result. The silver was further brought out by the skirt's trimming, which was, first, a tiny plait of blue silk, then rows of fine passementerie in mingled steel and jet. At the hips was a reproduction of the lower trimming. The corsage was peculiar and difficult to describe. A yoke was made of rows of the fine passementerie, and a slender, pointed effect was given to the short basque by a black moire band that started from
