FREELAND, PA., JULY 15, 1895.

When Is a Veto Complete?

From the Philadelphia Times.

The fact that Governor Hastings, after having filed vetoes of three bills with the secretary of the commonwealth, recalled the bills and signed them, has given rise to very general discussion as to whether those bills are laws, or whether the veto when filed was his final action on each measure. One of these bills makes an appropriation of $260,000 to the normal schools of the state and is therefore very important. The other two are not of such importance as to provoke action to test the validity of the veto.

The fifteenth section of the fourth article of the constitution provides that bills presented to the governor within ten days of the final adjournment of the legislature, shall become laws without his approval unless he shall file the same with his objections in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, and give notice thereof by public proclamation, within thirty days after such adjournment.

On Saturday last the governor prepared a veto of all the bill appropriating $260,000 to the normal schools, filed it with the secretary of the commonwealth, and the deputy secretary proclaimed the filing of the veto from the steps of the capitol at noon of that date, thus complying with all the requirements of the constitution. On Monday of this week he withdrew his veto and approved the bill.

As this bill involves a very large appropriation, and as the representatives of a number of other institutions have been grievously disappointed by the veto of their appropriations, it is more than probable that measures will be taken to contest the validity of normal school bills. Unless judicial proceedings shall be instituted, the state treasurer and accounting officers of the state can only obey the law as it is; for they have no judicial powers and cannot question the validity of a statute.

If the facts are as generally stated, and as yet they are not disputed as far as we have heard, that the governor vetoed the normal school appropriation on Saturday, filed his veto and publicly proclaimed the same from the steps of the capitol on that day, it would seem clear that the veto was complete and that the courts could enjoin the financial officers from the payment of the appropriation.

A veto given after the adjournment of the legislature thus filed and proclaimed, complies with every requirement of the constitution, and would appear to have the precise effect of the governor sending it to the legislature. A veto transmitted by the governor to the legislature certainly could not be recalled after it had become a part of the records of the body.

Another question as to the validity of a law has arisen in the bill providing for the appointment of game commissioners in this state. It originally appropriated money to pay the expenses of the commission, but the granger element of the house defeated it, and the bill passed with the appropriation eliminated. The senate restored the appropriation, and in the conference committee an agreement was reached by which $1,500 was appropriated for the expenses, but the house defeated the conference report. Notwithstanding this failure to pass, it was certified to the governor and has been signed by him.

Regardless of the fact that the bill was defeated in the legislature, it is now to every extent and purpose the law of the state. No official charged with its execution can question its validity, and it is doubtful whether even the courts would declare it invalid.

It has been suggested that our long presidential campaigns be reduced to a shorter period of political maneuvering, and that, instead of calling the conventions in June as generally of recent years, we should defer the nominations until September—which would still afford from four to eight weeks for an active, earnest and vigorous campaign. This suggestion is surely worth respectful consideration; for it has many points in its favor. In the first place, as one of our contemporaries has declared, it would reduce the expenses of the campaign, and consequently the opportunities for political plunder; but its most desirable feature is that it would relieve us of the long-drawn-out and tedious strain of a June to November campaign. It would be another evidence that we Americans can do things quickly and thoroughly, and at the same time intelligently. —Philadelphia Record.

Champ Clark on the Vagaries of Luck.

IT STICKS TO SENATOR COCKRELL.

How a Defeat Proved a Blessing in Disguise and Laid the Foundations of His Fortunes—Senator Cockrell's Views of War Tactics.

[Copyright, 1895.]

"There are some people who affect to sneer at luck," says Champ Clark, the famous congressman from Missouri. "All such should stroll over to the senate end of the capitol some day and hold close communion for awhile with General Francis Marion Cockrell, senior and perpetual senator from Missouri, and discover what he thinks of it. He knows or ought to know for of all the men who walk the streets of Washington he is the luckiest. Twenty-four years a senator, with almost a certainty of holding down a curule chair for a quarter of a century more, if he lives that long, his lines have indeed been cast in pleasant places, and his brow is being remarkably reared in green pastures. If Cockrell does not work himself to death—a thing by no means improbable—Thomas H. Denton, with his unequalled record of 30 years in the senate of the United States—or as he pompously expressed it 'six Roman lustrians'—won't be a marker to him.

"Luck! In 1874 he wanted to be governor of Missouri and came very near having his heart's desire gratified in that regard. He heeded only one-sixth of one vote of securing the nomination, which was equivalent to an election. Perhaps that is the closest shave on record for a great office. The history of the governorship of Missouri is the queerest and most inexplicable chapter in the annals of American politics. It is worthy of the profoundest consideration of the whole school of philosophers. In every other state in the Union the governorship is used as a stepping stone to higher preferment—to the United States senate, the cabinet, the federal supreme bench, foreign ministries, ambassadorships, the vice presidency and even the presidency itself. But in Missouri, by immemorial custom, the governorship is considered as the top round in the ladder, the jumping off place, the ultima Thule. Missouri has had governors great and small, governors good, bad and indifferent, but their fate is the same. Over the doors of the state gubernatorial mansion at Jefferson City there ought to be inscribed this sentiment from Dante's 'Inferno': 'All hope abandon, ye who enter here.'

"Only one governor has really survived it, and that was Truman. Folk in antebellum times. He would not run for governor until all the party leaders had agreed to make him United States senator, which they did. He pulled the party through, and they kept their promise to him. He served as governor only 34 days. The history of the governorship of Missouri has always reminded me of the tale in the book of Job, where the man of Uz and his friends were feasting and a messenger broke in upon their merriment with the grewsome intelligence that there had been a great storm in which all the sons of Job and their retainers had been killed, and he alone was left to tell the tale.

"At any rate Cockrell wanted to be governor and was balked in his ambition by only a fraction of a vote, but a miss is as good as a mile, so we are informed by some ancient proverb maker. He ought to thank God every night for that lucky escape. Had he succeeded he would in all probability have had before him two years of the governor's office in the office of oblivion. His defeat was a blessing in disguise and laid the foundations of his fortunes. It is passing strange what small and seemingly trivial things determine the destinies of men and even of nations.

"By the accident of being the last man to embark on a steamer after the affair at Belmont, General Grant was started on the road to Appomattox and the White House. By flaying Sir Robert Peel on the night when he announced his free trade policy in the house of commons, Benjamin Disraeli took the first step in that marvelous career which dazzled the world and which ended in the presidency and an earldom. Because his uncontrollable horse ran away and carried him straight into the enemies' lines in some obscure battle in south Asia, enabling him to capture the commanding general, Arthur Wellesley subsequently added Waterloo to the long line of English victories, became the Iron Duke and slept among the great in Westminster abbey. By reason of the fact that his pistol failed to fire on the occasions when he attempted suicide young Robert Clive concluded that God intended him for great things and lived to create the British empire in India, to become a peer of the realm and to wear a name in characters of blood high upon the roll of English speaking captains.

"But to return to General Cockrell. During the campaign for the nomination he repeatedly declared that if Hardin, Colman or anybody else defeated him no throne would be lifted tender and no hat thrown higher than his for his successful competitor. So when Charles H. Hardin was nominated and Cockrell was called on for a speech he good naturedly referred to his promise, and then and there, as the incidents say, threw his big white slouch hat to the lofty ceiling of the convention hall and gave a hasty rebel yell which started the catfish in the Missouri river. That performance made him senator, and no state ever had a better one.

"It is said that the great King Cyrus knew the name of every soldier in his vast armies. Cockrell never forgets either the name or the face of any person to whom he has been introduced. This faculty is simply invaluable to a public man and has been of incalculable benefit to the distinguished Missouri senator.

"Luck! Go! Suppose General Cockrell had defeated Hardin? The chances are a thousand to one that he never would have had the opportunity to prevent innumerable raids upon the federal treasury, thereby saving untold millions to the people. He ought to hunt up the delegate who cast that fractional vote against him and dress him in purple and fine linen the remnant of his days.

"Some people say—among others that eminent publicist, orator and journalist, Henry Watterson—and Stonewall Jackson was the one Puritan soldier of our civil war. They speak without knowledge. Stonewall was a Puritan indeed, worthy to have charged with mighty Oliver at Naseby, Marston Moor and Dunbar, shouting, 'God with us!' but so was Francis Marion. He fought and he prayed and he prayed and he fought, and it remains to this day a mooted question whether he fought more than he prayed or prayed more than he fought. If Jackson was the superintendent of a Sunday school at Lexington, Va., Cockrell was engaged in the same way at Warrensburg, Mo. He started in a more original character, he was considered as a major general during the very last days of the war. He was a volunteer without military training, and that fact ex necessitate deprived him of any particular favor in the Confederate war department, where the delusion prevailed that no man could be great in arms unless he had graduated from West Point, which delusion seems to have prevailed also in the federal war office. Nevertheless events appear to indicate that, even with this handicap, had the war lasted four years longer General Cockrell would have risen to the highest command.

"He fought. That made his soldiers love him, and that is one thing which makes the people of Missouri love him. He is just about as popular with the ex-Union soldiers among his constituents as with those who followed the stars and bars.

"General Cockrell, being a volunteer, evolved some original theories of warfare which are calculated to stun the typical martinet. For instance, after the first battle in which he fought, green as he was in things martial, he would never permit an army engineer to select his line of battle for him. He said that as the duty of defending the line devolved on him he knew better than any engineer what was a defensible line and what was not. This may have seemed presumptuous in a raw recruit, but his military history furnishes his justification.

"Another thing that he sticks to is this day, and which will give the souls of the professionals a rude shock, is that the most effective weapon with which infantry can be armed is a double barreled shotgun. He claims that it will discount all the new fangled rifles ever made. His logic runs as follows, and to a civilian appears absolutely convincing: 'One wounded man on the battlefield is ever so much more trouble than one dead man. The double barreled shotgun is unequalled as a producer of wounded men; therefore it is the best thing to arm troops with.'

"As a clincher he states that in a certain battle in which he was engaged when he was a colonel two companies of his regiment were armed with double barreled shotguns and the other with Enfield rifles, and that when the fighting was over there were more dead and wounded men in front of the two companies with shotguns than in front of the eight armed with rifles. If seeing is believing, then any rational being not under the tyranny of preconceived opinions ought to be convinced by General Cockrell's reasoning."

TEN-MINUTE EXERCISES.

If Taken Every Day They Make Women Look Truly Beautiful.

Everything in a woman's life should be done temperately, especially the wearing of corsets. This eternal lecturing upon the evils of corset-wearing is all folly; to condemn tight lacing is another thing, but the loose, wide-made corset is to be commended.

Of course all exercise should be taken with the waist perfectly free, and when vigorous out-of-door sports are indulged in no stay should be worn; but when in the street or at home or at social functions the corset worn sensibly is a necessity of all women who claim any degree of that intangible something called style.

It is perhaps unnecessary to add that all the walking in the open air one can possibly do, unless it is in the hot sun, serves to add to one's health and beauty, and a woman should be out of doors all that she possibly can, as nothing brings the bloom into her cheeks so quickly or so beautifully as God's pure air and sunshine.—Marie Jourcan, in Chicago Record.

Keep All Food Covered.

Every article of food should be kept covered until it appears on the table. Milk and butter should be kept in airtight covered vessels. They take up every odor flying in the air, and are positively harmful to the stomach after standing uncovered for an hour or two. Not only odors, but the animalcules that fill the air are attracted to milk and butter. Uncovered jelly is a menace to family health, yet in two-thirds of the pantries in the city will be found half-used dishes of jelly standing uncovered.—Good Housekeeping.

A New Feminine Industry.

Several young women in London have started a novel and sensible dressmaking establishment. They take last season's dresses and make them over in the prevailing fashion. No entirely new dresses are made, and the charges are reasonable. They should succeed, for the world is full of nice people who do not often buy a completely new dress, and to those who sometimes have dresses given them by their richer sisters such a place would prove a decided benefit.—Queen.

UPPER LEHIGH NOTES.

John Charney, one of our Hungarian residents, has a queer conception of the law. While at Freeland last Friday he called at Lazarak's bottling works, and during his inspection of the establishment managed to get several bottles of beer in his pockets. As he was leaving the stolen bottles were noticed by Andrew Zelenak, who drives for Lazarak. He gave Charney a chase, but before capturing him the Upper Lehigh man fell and cut his head. He contended that Zelenak was responsible for his injuries and had him arrested. The justice failed to see the case in the same light as Charney, and at the hearing the driver was discharged. John came home a wiser man than when he left, having learned that the country is not so free nor the law so crooked as he thought.
