MONDAY AND THURSDAY

GOVERDENTAN

And Day smiles softly on the Sun, her lover, Scattering rose-petals of celestial light

Then wake, dear heart. Aurora of my skies, my morn is in the love-light of your eyes. Hwake, dear heart, while you are sleeping,

Beneath your window Cove is crouching, weeping,
Cailing upon vou, shuddering and sighing,
Poor homeless Cove, upon your threshold lying.
Cold winds blow on him, and his teet are weary
With wand ring through a wint'ry world and dreary.
His wings are drooping, and his quiver broken,
In falt'ring tones his piteous plaint is spoken.

Then wake, dear heart, and take him to your breast.

The secret joys that through their fibres tremble. And Morn, and Spring, and Love, and I await, Like humble pilgrims at a castle gate. Within our hearts, Hope, bursting into flower, Gives promise of that long-desired hour. Bear Chatelaine, when wide the portal's thrown, And we shall enter, and possess our own.

There soothe his hurts and tull him into rest. Awaliz, dear heart, for, gently stealing
Chrough the dark sod, Spring is her soul revealing— Brown sheath and naked branches scarce dis-

Stream to the earth, that her white feet caresses,
And heaven to the utmost zenith flushes
With the glad radiance of her happy blushes.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

Merry and Gay.

All the seasons have their signs and tok
ens. In the olden times, long before there arose distinctions between Jew and Gentile.
Romans and barbarians, Christians and heathens, the divisions of time known amonths came to be distinguished by the specialty of temperature, and those char acteristics which make up the history of man.

months came to be distinguished by the specialty of temperature, and those characteristics which make up the history of man.

January, sour-visaged, lusty and blustering, yet having some lines of kindness, locks up the earth and the waters in a fatherly embrace; March, open-eyed and dusty with the released wealth of winter; April, with its rainbows; May, with its blossoms; June, with its roses; July, with its meadows wafting perfumed promises into every home stead; August, with its rich treasures ready for the gathering; September, with the last blush of summer on its cheeks; October, with its jubilant chorus of the winds; November, with its instructive warning of approaching change, and December, despite the rain clouds which lower on its brow, with its hallowed associations; each has a story to tell. The youthful mind with undoubting eestasy exclaims: Commend us to February—the mouth in which in fair Italy the birds begin to pair.

It was in February that a certain St. Valentine, who must have been the Colenso of his age, was put to a cruel death by certain dogmatists, who could not see anything good either in him or the gospel he preached; and because the martyr suffered at the time spring was about to open its silver gates, and the wrong was done while those self-same dogmatists were holding one of their love festivals, the memory of the death, and when it happened, passed unbroken into distant generations; and thus it is that, in Christian lands, just as the cold shadows of winter are beginning to put on their livery of gray, the saint of the fourth century is made the annually presiding genius of the loves of every recurring year. So it has been, and so may it ever be. The march of inexorable circumstances has left us but little of the poetry of life, and what we have let us eling to hard and fast. Existence, without one true rainbow in its sky, would be intolerable, therefore it is that the festival of St. Valentine is so honored.

All hair, then, to St. Valentine—the first gentleman of Christendom, and His Valentine.

Dear girl, I have no bauble fine,
No trinket rich and gay,
No lewel rare, no gem divine
To greet great Cupid's day.
But take, oh, sweetheart, as my gift
What may my love disclose:
I offer, though my purse be rift,
One big midwinter rose.
