on Their Summer Trip in Foreign

Now on Their Summer Trip in Foreign
One of the most pleasant things about being an Annapolis cadet is the chance they have of going on summer cruises. The second class men are now aboard an old-fashioned sailing vessel, such as was used by our navy before we had steam warships. These young men are required to do the work of common sailors; in fact, they do everything there is to be done on the boat. They started in June, and will return in September. They stop for a week or so at Plymouth, England, and arrangements have been made for them to spend a few days in London. Then they sail for Lisbon, Portugal, and the boys are wondering how Spain's neighbors will receive them. After that they go to Gibraltar, and then home again. Of course there is a good deal of fun to be got out of the trip, and a great deal to see; but it is a part of their four years' course at the naval academy, and they have to work hard scrubbing decks and taking in sails, and the slightest disobedience is punished. Before they left this country they stopped off Hampton Roads for a few days and went through a lot of drilling, including the "deserting of the ship." In this drill the crew puts provisions in the small boats, launch them and row away toward land, just as they would have to do if the ship took fire or were in a sinking condition.

An Unhappy Name.

An Unhappy Name.

I remember hearing the following story from the late Canon Bardsley, author of "English Names and Surnames." There was once a woman— "a little 'crackey,' I think," said the canon, by way of parenthesis—who had a son whom she had christened
"What." Her idea seems to have been that when in after days he was asked that when in after days he was asked his name, and kept saying "What," amusing scenes would follow, which was likely enough, especially if the boy was careful to pronounce the as-pirate. Such a scene did, I believe, occur once when he went to school, and was told, as a newcomer, to stand up and furnish certain particulars. "What is your name?" asked the teacher. "What," blurted out the boy, "What is your name?" asked the teacher. "What," blurted out the boy, amid the laughter of the class. "What is your name?" asked the master again, with more emphasis. "What," replied the boy. "Your name, sir!" roared back the inturisted pedagogue. "What, What!" roared back the terrifled urchin. The sequel I forget, but I believe it one of those cases in which the follies of the parents are visited on the children of the first generation.—Notes and Queries.

Alleged Discovery That Is Expected to Revolutionize a Great Industry.

Just & Americans begin to feel that they are upon the verge of developing superiority to Great Britain, not only in shipbuilding, but in the steel trade, in which such a number of valuable foreign contracts have lately been taken by our manufacturers in the face of British competition; and just as nature seems to encourage the American aspiration by showing that the English coal mines will be exhausted within another fifty years, science seems to be coming to the aid of the Britisher, and may be about to open new fields of competition in steel in which America must take part if she is to maintain her hard-earned prestige.

The discovery has been demonstrated in London, and is being made much of by the English press, that the ability to produce perfect steel by casting it in a vacuum made by liquid hydrogen with a process that it is not proposed to make public, has at last attained practicability. A company has been formed with a capital of thirty thousand pounds to experimentally develop the process and if the plan is as successful as Professor Dewar, the discoverer, presumes it will be, the air bubbles that now cause

How Eastern Correspondents Add to the Unique Fame of a Great State.

Mr. Coburn, the agricultural commissioner of Kansas, charges all the notoriety that Kansas has suffered from during the last quarter of a ceutury to eastern newspaper correspondents, who, he says, have visited that state, and have tried to interest their readers by inventing freaks and fabulcus stories.

"It has been left to the correspondents of eastern papers to portray Kansas to the world in all the various shades and tints," says Mr. Coburn, "from those of gloomiest midnight and deepest woe to brightest noonday and heaven's gilding. His finest work, that which has always stamped him as possessing the true artistic temperament, has been his treatment of weather conditions, especially our impulsive zephyrs and periods of procrastinated rainfall. The lines of thought always discernible in his work are that we are in a chronic condition of cyclone, drought or blizzard, variegated by invasions and devastations of chinchings and grasshoppers. In dealing with the former he describes the wind which he says blew a cow up against the side of a barn and held her there for 12 days, or until she starved to death. The same wind, says this veracious chronicler, blew the cracks out of the fences, sucked a cistern from the ground, moved the township line and changed the day of the week, while it yanked the bunghole out of a barrel and buried it in a sandhill 80 miles away.

The way out of my difficulty came to me like a flash.

"In the little office were three incandescent lamps. I turned the key and put out one, unscrewed it, and in another moment had the pad of paper with its carbon sheet in front of me. At the big end of the bulb was a protruding point of glass. I took the globe in my hand, holding it like a stylus, and marked on the top sheet: "The Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Orientalists will do well to be on their guard in connection with Central Asian manuscripts, which have of late provided them with such an endless subject of discussion, says the Scotsman. It was Capt. Bower who first discovered the existence of some extremely ancient manuscripts during his great journey across central Asia, and Dr. Sven Hedin prought back a rich collection for the edification and rich collection for the edification and mystification of orientalists. Since then the supply of ancient manuscripts has been very great, but it is stated that the gravest suspicion is now cast upon the authenticity of a very large proportion of these so-called relics of antiquity.

An English officer who is now en-An English officer who is now engaged in some exploring work in Central Asia has discovered that there exists in Khotan a regular manufactory of the manuscript relics, and so large is the output that he believes that at least 95 per cent of the manuthat at least 95 per cent of the manuscripts which have reached Europe from central Asia during recent years are spurious. The process of manufacture has been explained to him, and so impressed is he with the difficulty of distinguishing between the genuine and the counterfeit that he has himself adopted a rule of never under any circumstances buying any ancient book offered to him for sale. Meanwhile there is much searching of hearts among the owners of the manuscripts which have already found their way into European collections.

There was a game of baseball the other day at one of the local ball parks between a local team and a picked nine. A clerk in one of the dry goods stores got the afternoon off and took his girl, who was not a connoiseur of a ball game. In the second inning the ball came skipping into the grandstand and the umpire called "foul."

"Say," said the wise girl, "why did he call that ball fowl? I didn't see any feathers on it." "Didn't I tell-you that it was a picked nine?" he replied.

ABOUT BERNHARDT.

Mme. Bernhardt gives the following Mme. Bernhardt gives the following account of her admission into the Conservatoire: "Auber was present, and asked me: 'Your name is Sarah?' 'Yes, sir.' 'You are a Jewess?' 'By birth, sir, but I have been baptized.'' Sarah then recited two verses of "Les Deux Pigeons," and was interrupted. "Then came the business of selecting the right class. Beauvallet declared for tragedy, Regnier for comedy, Provost for both, and Sarah selected both, and thus devoted herself simultaneously to the culture of the two muses, Melpomene and Thalia.

It seems that at first the future queen of the stage did not care for it in the least. Above all she hated her daily journeys to and fro in the omnibus, "and to this day I detest promiscuous assemblies and miscellaneous crowds." Mme, Bernhadt next assures us that she was never able to win a first prize at the Conservatoire, only a second, and that but once, and for tragedy. After a year's study at the Conservatoire, Mme, Bernhardt passed into the company of the Theater Francais, and made her debut in Racine's "iphiand made her debut in Racine's "Iphigenie." She writes: "My arms were so long and so thin that when in the scene of the sacrifice I uplifted them before the altar the house burst into a roar of laughter and I was mortified to tears. I next played Valerie in Scribe's play of that name, with Coquelin as Ambroise, and I was succe ful. But even then I could not ove come my innate dislike for the stag I never put foot inside the theater e cept for rehearsals and performance:

In 1879, as all the world will remember, Sarah Bernhadt went to London for the first time, appearing in "Phedre." She at once established her position in that country and was not only a success on the stage, but the "lioness" in chief of the London season, every fashionable hostess seeking the privilege of her acquaintance, and no party was considered complete without her presence.
