Taking the Turkey Off the Range

Contrary to popular belief, successful experiments indicate that the turkey can be profitably taken from the range to a smaller and more modern domain where it has a greater chance of survival than when allowed to roam at will, says the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation.

Turkey eggs hatched in incubators, poults brooded artificially, reared on limited range in rotated lots, fed regularly from the second day to maturity, on a carefully planned diet and kept entirely separate from chickens, summarizes the new method of raising turkeys in semi-confinement. Under this system, two hundred poults can be raised on an acre and land ordinarily used for turkey grazing is saved for other crops.

When turkeys roam the farm, mingling with chickens which often carry the dreaded blackhead disease, losses frequently are so heavy as to eat up all profits. When turkeys are raised in semi-confinement, they are put on ground free from infection and are kept away from chickens altogether.

Experiments conducted by the North Dakota Agricultural college showed that the feed cost of turkeys grown in confinement from June 1 to November 23 averaged less than 8 cents a pound. Other production costs, including initial cost of the egg, incubation cost, and brooder cost, probably run from $1 to $1.50 per poult. This should leave a substantial margin of profit in well-managed flocks, according to the Foundation.
