> Near Petersburg, Va., July 23, 1924.

Dear Uncle:

I have read both yours and Uncle James' welcome letters, but I have not had time to answer them. I have worked harder of late with body and brain than I ever did in my life before. I have projected, undertaken and completed a gigantic work: and have accomplished one of the greatest things in this war: I have excavated a mine gallery from our line to and under the enemy's works. This mine is 511 feet in length and has lateral galleries of feet, making total distance 586 feet.

I am under one of their principal forts, and as soon as the "high authorities are ready, will put in 12,000 (twelve thousand) pounds of powder in nine enormous magazines and will blow fort, cannon and rebels to the clouds.

The chief engineer of the army and the rest of the regular army wiseacres said it was not feasible; that I could not carry the ventilation that distance without digging a hole to the surface, and that I would either get the men crushed by falls of earth or have them smothered.

Old Burnside stood by me. Told me to go ahead and I have succeeded.

When I began I had neither an inch of board or a single nail. I caused our big picks to be made smaller; got cracker boxes and made hand-burrows out of them and went ahead day and night until I finished it.

I now wait the order to put in the powder and reap the fruits of the work. It is terrible, however, to hurl several hundred men with my own hand at one blow into eternity, but I believe I am doing

Be sure not to speak of this matter outside of Uncle James and Aunt Emily until the thing is done,

A later dispatch from the Associated Press correspondent—at City Point states the assault of Petersburg commenced at 9 o'clock Saturday morning by a terrible explosion which completely destroyed one of the enemy's principal forts in front of Petersburg, containing sixteen guns. This was reduced to a mass of ruins. Immediately upon this explosion our artillery opened with one simultaeous and continuous roar above the entire line of General Grant's army.

To complete the presentation of these trophies Dr. Pleasants presented to the State Museum the commission of General Henry Pleasants, which i signed to Governor Curtin and Eli Silfer, as Secretary of the Commonwealth.
