CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA HARD HIT BY DROUGHT

All known drought records for Central Pennsylvania have been eclipsed this summer. July and August were the driest consecutive crop-growing months ever recorded for one year at the weather bureau of the agricultural experiment station at the Pennsylvania State College. It has kept such records since 1900.

State College is located in the Nittany Valley at the head of Penns Valley and is typical of the Central Pennsylvania region. Rainfall for July was 1.39 inches and that for August was 1.46 inches.

Only one August, that of 1925, had less rainfall, 1.13 inches, but July of that year had almost six inches. The previous low for July was 1921 when 2.25 inches of rain fell.

Traveling extension specialists from the college who get to every part of the State, declare that the central counties are the hardest hit. Farmers everywhere are hauling water. Potatoes on the college farms are estimated to yield only 30 per cent of normal crop, and corn will yield only 50 per cent, and practically the same conditions exist in other central counties. Extension men express the opinion that Lancaster county probably has suffered less than any other county in the State.
