Samples of the potatoes and cabbage are on display in the windows of Corey Frantz's store on Main street. Many of the heads of cabbage weigh as high as eleven pounds.

Inspects Office

Last week we paid a visit to the offices of the Electro-Painless dentists at 7 East Market street in Wilkes-Barre. Times have changed since we were a youngster and dreaded the very name of a dentist's office, painful or otherwise. And so it was with a great deal of interest that we inspected the recent innovations in the art of dentistry.

Dr. Morgan, who by the way, is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania Dental College, and who played base ball with the University team against our own college team at Hanover, N. H., and who has played base ball at Noxen, showed us about the offices and explained all of the new instruments which reduce pain during dental work to a minimum.

There is no wizardry or slight of hand in the reduction of pain in the modern dental office. Care and expertness are still the big factors as always. Instruments must never be allowed to dull and must be constantly cared for. Along this line, Dr. Morgan brought out an interesting anecdote. There are today men who travel about the United States doing nothing but sharpening and caring for dental and surgical instruments. These men are highly skilled and demand big prices for their services. One of these experts who visits Wilkes-Barre often travel in a Packard automobile, stops at the Hotel Sterling and carries a complete equipment for instrument repair.

One of the most interesting pieces of equipment in the Electro Painless dentist's office is the Heidbring machine which administers nitrous-oxide to the patient. This gas is a complete anathsea and has no effect upon any of the organs of the body. It is a combination of nitrogen and oxygen, two of the great life-giving gases of the atmosphere. When the gas is administered it causes complete relaxation and makes the patient oblivious to pain. Many persons who otherwise approach a dental office with fear and dread willingly submit to the use of nitrous-oxide and suffer no nervousness whatever in having teeth extracted. Using this gas, Dr. Morgan has frequently extracted more than one hundred teeth a day. During the world war in army dispensaries it was not uncommon for dentists to exceed even this large number of extractions in one day.

Modern dental equipment is very expensive. Many of the more delicate drills and parts are manufactured in Germany, American craftsmen not yet having learned the secret of their manufacture. Recently pictures have been syndicated in American newspapers of the ancient dental instruments used during the Revolutionary period in the United States. The set photographed is now in the possession of Henry Ford and is in his museum at Detroit. It is a far cry from the old-fashioned hooks and prongs of that antiquated set to the modern electric units which frequently weigh seven or eight hundred pounds. Most of the dentist's instruments are attached to this unit. Warm sprays are electrically heated and there is electric sterilization for every instrument. A few decades ago sterilization was little thought of, today, it is an ever-present necessity with the skilled and careful dentist and surgeon. The modern dentist is not only thoroughly acquainted with the art of extraction and filling eeh but he must also be a skilled artisan in the construction of plates and teeth to take the place of the natural set. This work is done with plastic materials and requires the utmost care to make a set that will fit perfectly and cause no discomfort to the wearer. The Electro-Painless dentists have a thoroughly modern and scientifically equipped laboratory for this work.

The dentist, like the surgeon, is frequently baffled by surface symptoms. He then has recourse to the X-ray. The Electro-Painless Dentists' office is equipped with one of these splendid machines, manufactured by the Ritter Company of Rochester, N. Y. With the use of this machine, which requires a special course of training, the dentist is able to disclose hidden pus sac which contaminate the entire system of the patient. Many times nervous diseases, stomach disorders and other trouble not attributed to the teeth are found to have their origin in the poison which comes from these pus sacs at the base of the teeth.

To one who is interested in the developments of modern dentistry a visit to the Electro-Painless Dentists' office is a revelation. The atmosphere of the office, the personalities of the doctors and the skill with which they handle their patients' cases is one to inspire confidence in the person seeking to have dental work done.
