

In The Wyoming Valley

SYNOPSIS

The story so far:

Enos Baker, a Connecticut boy and an orphan, journeys to the Wyoming Valley in quest of his uncle, James Baker, whose advice he wishes to seek before joining the Continental army in the Revolutionary War. As he enters the Valley of the Wyoming, he is overtaken by a horseman. The lad journeys with the rider to the cabin of James Baker where he discovers that his companion is his uncle.

Distraught by her husband's absence from home (he has been a member of the army for a year) and by reports of possible attacks upon the Valley which is poorly protected because most of the men are at Valley Forge, Mercy Baker, James' wife, gives Enos a sharp and unkind welcome.

Shortly after the arrival of the two travelers, an Indian, Slippery Tim by name, and a settler, Hendrick Van Gordon, both of questionable reputation, enter the yard afoot. After greeting Enos and his uncle, the two strangers, already partially intoxicated, ask for "firewater." It is refused, and the two men depart, leaving James Baker apprehensive of future revenge.

That night Enos interrupts one attempt on the part of Slippery Tim to steal his horse, but the morning finds the horse gone, so the boy and his uncle set out for the home of the Van Gordons where they feel sure they will discover the whereabouts of the horse.

As they approach the Van Gordon home, Slippery Tim leaps to the back of Enos' horse and dashes away into the forest. By clever threats, James Baker intimidates Van Gordon, who in turn intimidates the Indian, and the horse is found in the barn when the two Bakers return to the farm. A slender barbed arrow, a possible warning of the future, is found upon the floor of the barn, however.

It is soon forgotten in the activities of the evening for the community gathers at the homestead to welcome Mr. Baker. Enos meets Mary Dana, daughter of one of the best loved farmers of the settlement.

Following the party, James Baker and Enos walk to the blockhouse, standing in its shadow, conversing, they see Slippery Tim and Hendrick Van Gordon pass stealthily.

Suspecting mischief, the two colonists separate and cautiously retrace their steps to the Baker farm. Enos arrives in time to prevent Slippery Tim from stealing his horse, but through the open door, he discovers a blaze within the barn. Now go on with the story.

CHAPTER IX THE DECISION

Unmindful of everything now, save the peril of the burning barn, Enos rushed into the building, instantly closed and barred the doors behind him to shut off the draught, and then began to work to check the flames. The fire had been kindled in a small pile of hay directly in front of the stalls from which there was a side door that could be lifted or swung open upon its leather hinges, and through which the hay could be thrown into the mangers. This trap door was now open and the two horses were stamping and neighing in their terror as they beheld the small fire before them on the floor of the barn. Disregarding the confusion, Enos took off his thick jacket and throwing it upon the smoking fire tried to stifle the flame. For a moment it died down, but the smoke was blinding and as soon as Enos raised himself the fire threatened to start up afresh. Satisfied that he could not put out the fire in this manner, Enos shouted for help. Tories, Indians, the loss of his horse, were all forgotten in the face of the terrible peril; for if once the fire should gain headway it would mean not only the loss of the barn and its contents but also of the house and all it contained.

He thought of the heavy horse blanket he had left hanging on a near by peg, and flinging his scorched and smoking coat to one side he made a dash for the place where the blanket had been left, and to his delight he discovered it there, and in a moment he had thrown it on the smoking heap, and quickly cast himself at full length upon it.

Once more the blaze died down, but the smoke was stifling, blinding. He did not know that his hands were blistered; he thought only of putting out the fire or holding it down until help should come. Where was his uncle and why did he not come to his aid? In a brief time the flames would burst forth again, and do what he might, he was confident he could not prevent them from spreading to the low loft which was directly over the horses' stalls. Again and again he shouted and called for aid, and soon to his inexpressible joy he heard his uncle at the door of the barn, but the door was closed and he could not enter.

"The barn is on fire," exclaimed Enos. "I'll burn up if you don't come quickly!"

"Open the door! Open the door!" shouted his uncle in his excitement.

"I can't! I can't! I'm holding the fire down with a blanket. Run around to the stable. Hurry! Be quick! Oh, he quick! Be quick!"

The smoke was now so nearly stifling that Enos could hardly breathe, and the heat was becoming unbearable. Already there were holes burned in the blanket, but the lad was not yet aware of his own suffering. The stamping and snorts of fear of the horses added to the confusion and for a moment it seemed to Enos that he must leave his place and rush forth into the open air and get one good breath, be the consequences what they might.

Although the time seemed almost endless to the desperate lad, in reality only a minute or two had elapsed before his uncle had joined him, holding a bucket of water in his hands, which he had secured at the spring which was near the corner of the barn. He too had shouted and called to the house for aid, and now Mercy and the children appeared.

James Baker quickly stationed them in line with Mercy at the spring and then the three pails or buckets which belonged to the barn were swiftly filled by her and passed rapidly from one to another, while James Baker, himself standing near the fire, poured the contents upon the smoking hay as rapidly as he received them.

For a moment thick clouds of smoke rolled up and almost stifled Enos, who still kept his place upon the blanket. All were working with a zeal born of desperation now, and the question would soon be settled. Pail after pail was poured upon the smoking mass, and at last James Baker, telling the children still to pass the water, ordered Enos to rise and open the large door.

As Enos instantly obeyed, his uncle seized a pitchfork and lifting a part of the burning hay upon it rushed with it out from the barn and flung the mass upon the grass outside. Again and again he repeated the task, the children and Enos meanwhile flinging the water from the pails upon the floor and the smoking hay that remained inside. The fire-fighters were gaining now, and at last not a vestige of the burning hay remained within the barn. To cover the scattered hay outside the building with water was a task that was soon completed, and then, for the first time since the peril had been discovered, Enos Baker breathed freely, and became aware of what he himself had suffered.

"'Twas a close call, lad, and had it not been for you we should not only have been without a barn but without a home as well. I had not looked for any such deed as this, for I was satisfied that the rascals would do nothing to stir up our suspicions at such a time. But I was mistaken, as better men than I have been before me."

"I'm glad it's over now," said Enos with a sigh.

"Yes; and we shall not be threatened again tonight. Are the horses all right?"

"Yes, I think so; only mine is gone. Perhaps I can get him though," and Enos placed his fingers in his mouth and whistled shrilly.

In a moment there came a whinny from the forest not far away, and when Enos had repeated his call his faithful horse was heard as he came from the woods and approached the group standing in front of the barn. He was quickly led to the stall he had so recently occupied and then, after looking to the fastenings of the doors, the little party returned to the house.

The expression seen upon the face of Enos, as soon as a candle was lighted, at once betrayed the pain he was suffering from his burns, and in response to his uncle's question he held forth his hands to the light. With many expressions of sympathy, James Baker proceeded to bind up the blistered fingers, a task in which his wife assisted him, and then, as soon as this had been accomplished and the children had been sent off to bed, the three seated themselves before the fire and James Baker said:

"I have no fear of the rascals returning tonight."

"'Tis well enough for you to say that," said his wife; "but your thinking does not make it so."

"It is not so because I think it, but I think it because it is so," replied her husband calmly. "But I have no desire to belittle the danger, and now that I must go back to the army tomorrow, I know that I must do something for my family before I go."

"To-morrow? To-morrow?" exclaimed Mercy, her voice rising almost to a scream as she spoke. "Oh, James Baker, you will not, you cannot go and leave us here in this way! Oh, my husband do not go! Oh, do not go! What shall I do? What shall I do? The woman's voice now was low and her cry was broken by sobs, while she swayed to and fro in her chair and flung her apron over her head as if she would shut out from the sight of others the agony she was suffering.

"Listen, Mercy," said James Baker in a low voice. "You know I do not go because I wish to, but because I must. I have given my word and no Baker ever yet broke a promise. You would not have me the first to do so, I am sure."

"But—" interrupted his wife.

"Nay, listen to me till I am done. I know it will not be safe to leave you here, though I do believe your peril will be less when I am away than it is while I am here, for it is plain that it is against me these evil deeds are pointed."

"What were the two shots I heard, just before the barn was set on fire?" said Enos quickly. "I had almost forgotten about them."

"I saw the man—I will not name him—creep up to the house, and from his actions I could not tell whether he was trying to break in at the kitchen window or to do what his rascally friend did at the barn. I watched him for a moment and then pulled out my pistol and fired to frighten him off, for I had no thought of killing him, though he richly deserved it; but as I fired he rose and saw me, for I had stepped out in the road, and then he too fired, but fortunately missed me. He then took to his heels and the last I saw of him he was disappearing in the woods over there by the sweet apple tree. He's gone now, and for good and all, I'm hoping."

"The next time it will be one of the children who will be shot or carried away, as they have already done with others," said Mercy Baker bitterly.

"I do not make light of the danger, Mercy," said her husband solemnly, "and I would that I could stay here to ward it off."

"A man's first duty is to his family."

"Nay, not so. A man's first duty is to God. But, Mercy, I am hoping when I return to camp and explain the peril and danger in which the people of the valley are dwelling, that I can obtain permission not only for myself but for some of my neighbors, who too are there, to come back here and to stay. To-morrow morning, before I start on my long ride, I shall go and see the Danas, and I am sure they will be willing and glad for you to come over there and stay with them. They live near to Forty Fort, and I shall feel better to have you where you can seek the safety and shelter of that, for 'tis by far the strongest of all the forts in Westmoreland, though I still hope that you will not have to use even that. This will not be for long, anyway, as I believe when I go back to camp and have explained just how everything is here, that I can obtain permission, as I said, to come back and fight, if it is necessary, for my own family and my neighbors."

"How long do you think it will be?" inquired Mercy Baker, with more cheerfulness than she had previously shown since her husband's return.

"That I cannot say, but I hope it will be only a few weeks at the longest."

"A few weeks!" groaned his wife. "Can you not come directly back?"

"I cannot promise, however much I may hope. But if there should be a delay and neither I nor any of my neighbors do come, then I shall hope that the committee will send some worthy men to the army to plead for us. Still that may not be necessary."

"But if we go over to the other side of the river and stay with the Danas, who will look after the stock and the place here?" inquired Mercy.

"I have been thinking of all that. There will be but two horses—Enos' and one of ours—and they can be taken over there too. As for the sheep and cattle and pigs, Enos can come over almost every day and look to them, and the nearest neighbors here will help too."

"And not a soul left upon the place," groaned Mercy. "Do you not see that it will be just an invitation to the men who were here last night to come back and help themselves to anything and everything they want?"

"I have thought of that too, Mercy. But listen: Last month young Asa Stevens led a scout which the committee detailed and the nine men who were with him brought back fire Tories who were at once sent to Connecticut, and are now held there as prisoners of war. To-morrow, or the day after, John Jenkins is to lead another scout, and they will either bring back the two rascals who tried to set fire to our barn to-night or they will drive them so far from the valley that no one will ever have cause to fear them again. Indeed, it is my opinion that Hendrick Van Gordon will never show his face any more in Wyoming. There, I declare if I haven't let out the name of the villain after all!"

"Then it was Hendrick you fired at, was it?" inquired Enos.

"Yes, it was; but it was the last time any Wyoming man will have that opportunity, I am certain."

Enos by no means felt so positive as his uncle appeared to, but he did not express his forebodings, and his uncle continued: "Now I have thought over this whole matter very carefully, and one reason, aside from my promise, why I think it best to go directly back to the camp is, so that I may obtain my release, or at least get permission to come home again. They ought to be willing for all of us to do that, for there will be no fighting by the army this winter, or so every one professes to believe, and that will be all the better for us and make it the more easy. Now to-morrow morning early I shall go to see the Danas and a few others, and after I have made the arrangements I have spoken of, I shall go back to the army, though I trust it will be but for a short time."

"It may be, and it may not be," sighed Mercy Baker.

"We'll hope for the best," said her husband cheerily. "And now for bed. It was a long time before Enos closed his eyes that night, for more than by the pain of his blistered fingers was he tormented by his forebodings as to what the following day might bring forth.
